amend the amendment by striking out the last word. Nothing is more common, I presume, all over the country than the assignment of notes secured by mortgage, different parties holding notes secured by the same mortgage, and each having the benefit of the mortgage to the extent of the notes held by him, the general doctrine being that notes are secured in the order in which they become due, or the order in which they are to the extent of the property mortgaged. The question arises whether the assignment of the note takes with it the assignment of the security of the mortgage. This stamp act comes in, and it is a question whether the assignee is entitled to the benefit of the security. It seems to me some mode might be devised by which that uncertainty would be removed. If it could it would be of great benefit to the country. I do not know whether the subject has ever before been brought to the attention of the Committee of Ways and Means or not.

I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The committee divided on the amendment of Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire; and there were—ayes thirty-two, noes not counted.

Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire. I hope the gentleman will consent to give us a vote in the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. I agree to that, that the amendment shall be reserved for a vote in the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the committee rise, with a view of doing away with the evening session and continuing our present session until five o'clock. I think the House will be ready to do more business if it is agreed to. Then the committee which meets in the morning to perfect amendments should have time to do so.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 49, noes 30.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the order for an evening session to-day be rescinded, and that the session to-day continue until five o'clock instead of half past four.

Mr. BLAINE. Say half past five.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will only move that the evening session be dispensed with for to-day.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope that will not be done unless it is agreed to sit until half past five. I admit I should like to have an evening's rest myself, but I am willing to sit until half past five. If we cannot do that I hope the evening session will not be dispensed with.

Mr. PAINE. I voted in favor of the rising of the committee under the supposition that it was agreeable to the Committee of Ways and Means. I understand now it is not, and I shall vote against the pending motion.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 43, noes 35; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. PAINE.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 53, noes 41.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the evening session for to-day was dispensed with.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MOORHEAD was granted leave of absence for a week.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 601) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1869; when the Speaker signed the same.

Mr. GARFIELD moved that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the tax bill.

Mr. BENJAMIN moved that the House adjourn; and demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Speaker appointed Mr. HIGBY and Mr. SCHENCK.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes 51.

Mr. BENJAMIN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—ayes 50, noes 50, not voting 89; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baker, Barnes, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Blair, Boyer, Brownell, Burr, Chanler, Cullom, Eckley, Ela, Eldridge, Ferriss, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Gravelly, Grover, Harding, Higby, Holman, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Julian, Kitchen, Knott, Lincoln, Marshall, Maynard, Mercur, Nicholson, Peters, Polsley, Robinson, Ross, Spaulding, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart, Taber, Taffe, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Auker, Van Trump, Ward, and Windom—50.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Beaman, Blaine, Butler, Cake, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cornell, Corvode, Daves, Driggs, Eliot, Ferry, Garfield, Getz, Griswold, Halsey, Jencks, Judd, Ketcham, Koontz, Logan, Lynch, McClurg, Miller, Moore, Morrell, Mullins, Niblack, O'Neill, Paine, Pile, Pomeroy, Price, Raum, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Seefeld, Starkweather, Stokes, Taylor, Twichell, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, William B. Washburn, and Welker—50.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Baldwin, Banks, Barnum, Beck, Bingham, Boutwell, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Cary, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Delano, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Fields, Finney, Fox, Haight, Hawkins, Hill, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Kelley, Kelsey, Kerr, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Loughridge, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, McCormick, McCullough, Moorhead, Morrissey, Munger, Myers, Newcomb, Nunn, Orth, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Poland, Pruyn, Randall, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, Thomas, John Trimble, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward—89.

So the House refused to adjourn.

RECONSTRUCTION.

On motion of Mr. BEAMAN, by unanimous consent, the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1058) to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama to representation in Congress were taken from the Speaker's table, and referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resume the consideration of the internal tax bill.

Mr. HARDING. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. KELSEY: The remonstrance of cigar manufacturers and journeymen cigar-makers of the town of Seneca, Ontario county, New York, against an increase of the tax upon the manufacture of cigars.

By Mr. POLSLEY: The petition for the establishment of a post route from Kanawha Salines, in Kanawha county, to Hiram Sizemove's, in Clay county, West Virginia.

By Mr. ROBERTSON: The petition of General Sigel and others, committee of arrangements of the National Association of American Sharpshooters for the third American shooting festival, to be held in New York city from June 26 to July 6, 1868, praying that certain prizes donated by friends and kindred associations in Europe may be exempted from the payment of duties.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, June 12, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Clinton F. Taggart, for pay for horses lost in the service of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented the memorial of the Protestant Episcopal parish of St. Mary's, Burlington, New Jersey, praying for the refunding of the duty paid on a chime of bells at New York under a misconstruction of the revenue laws; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORGAN presented the memorial of James Boorman Johnston and John A. Stewart, trustees for the holders of the mortgage bonds of the Selma, Rome, and Dalton Railroad Company, praying that the lands granted to the State of Alabama and transferred to that railroad company may be exempted from the operation of the bill (H. R. No. 267) to declare forfeited to the United States certain lands granted to aid in the construction of railroads in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Florida, and for other purposes, and that the change of location and route of that railroad may be recognized and authorized by Congress, and a grant of lands made to aid in its construction; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. RAMSEY. I present a memorial from that eminent publicist, Dr. Francis Lieber, on the subject of the postal service in the western States. I will read a portion of it:

"The memorial of the undersigned respectfully shows that the existing law regulating the carriage of the mail and charge of postage exacts letter postage on everything carried by the mail to the western Territories this side of California, excepting only newspapers and periodicals when sent to regular subscribers from the respective places of their publication. Books, reports, occasional numbers of periodicals, single newspapers, circulars, documents, maps, pamphlets of all sorts—on all of these the letter postage at three cents for half an ounce must be paid. The law exempts, it is believed, documents franked by members of Congress, but so far as the individual experience of your memorialist goes they do not reach the places of their destination.

"Soldiers stationed in the States this side of the Rocky mountains or in California may, according to the existing law, receive apparel and other things by mail at a reduced postage. This advantage, too, is denied the soldier stationed in the said Territories, who indeed stands most in need of this favor.

"This is a great grievance. Our sons and brothers and fathers in these distant Territories, whether they are in the Army, or pioneers as civilians in the service of civilization, stand most in need of constant and easy mail communication. If we boast that the school goes regularly along with the clearing ax and the minor's pick-ax, we ought not, it seems, to levy such postage on each primer, which is solely needed long before presses can be erected, as to prevent it from being sent by the thousand; and unless this can be done, the school-book is as not existing for the people in the distant West, however active an agent it may be elsewhere."

I move that this memorial be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and if there is no objection, I ask that it be printed. There are some interesting facts in it that may be useful to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and the order to print will be entered if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported a bill (S. No. 535) to reward the services of Matthew Low, of Nassau; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also presented letters from the Secretary of State and from the Secretary of the Navy, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, in relation to the services of Matthew Low, a resident of Nassau, New Providence, to the United States gunboat Tioga; which were ordered to be printed to accompany the bill.

Mr. NYE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 189) to amend the various acts establishing the Navy Department of the United States, reported it with amendments.

Mr. HENDRICKS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 398) to establish the right of way of the Portage Lake and Lake Superior ship-canal, and to provide for the extension and completion of the same, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. WILLEY. The Committee on Claims have had under consideration the petition of Robert Gibson, of Kentucky, praying for compensation for subsistence stores supplied to the Army of the United States. Mr. President, this presents one of the numerous cases of hardship occurring all over the border States during the war. It seems that United States troops were quartered on the farm of this gentleman for some time, and while there seized and consumed a good deal of his property, hogs, poultry, vegetables, horses, burned his fences, &c. It does not seem to have been done by any regular authority of the officers, though the fact is that the troops did seize and appropriate the property, perhaps to the value of thousands of dollars. It appeared to the committee to be in the nature of an unauthorized depredation by the troops, and although a case of great hardship it is of such a nature that the committee do not feel authorized to enter into it. They are therefore under the necessity of directing the petition to be reported back to the Senate, with a motion that they be discharged from its further consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee will be discharged, no objection being made.

Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Elizabeth Carson, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 536) for the relief of Elizabeth Carson. The bill was read and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARLAN. The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 534) relating to contested elections in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, have directed me to report it back with an amendment. As this is of immediate importance and probably necessary to prevent anarchy in the city, I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I object to its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over under the rule.

REV. JOHN M'MAHON.

Mr. MORTON. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 137) requesting the President to intercede with her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain to secure the speedy release of Rev. John McMahon, convicted on a charge of treason-felony, and now confined at Kingston, Canada West, have instructed me to report it back and recommend its passage; and I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks for the present consideration of the joint resolution reported by him. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. HOWARD. I am very anxious to take up Senate bill No. 256 this morning, relating to the Central Branch Union Pacific railroad. If this resolution is not going to take any time in discussion I will not make any objection to it.

Mr. MORTON and Mr. JOHNSON. It will not take any time.

Mr. CONNESS. I will say that I have no objection to the consideration of this bill, but I hope my friend from Michigan will not call up the bill to which he refers to the exclusion of one that I am anxious to have action upon and which I think will not excite discussion.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXCHANGE OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 121) to carry into effect the resolution approved March 2, 1867, providing for the exchange of certain public documents, have instructed me to report it back with amendments. This is to carry into effect a wholesome law, and the want of this provision stands in the way of it. I hope it will be considered at the present time. I am sure there will be no objection to it.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Congressional Printer to print fifty copies in addition to the regular number of all documents hereafter printed by order of either House of Congress or any Department or bureau of the Government, and one hundred copies additional of all documents ordered to be printed in excess of the usual number; the fifty or one hundred copies in each case to be delivered to the Librarian of Congress, to be exchanged under the direction of the joint Committee on the Library as provided by the joint resolution approved March 2, 1867. It is further provided that fifty copies of each publication printed under direction of any Department or bureau of the Government, whether at the Congressional Printing Office or elsewhere, shall be placed at the disposal of the joint Committee on the Library, to carry out the provisions of the resolution of March 2, 1867.

The first amendment of the Committee on Printing was to insert after the word "printer," in line four, the words, "whenever he shall be so directed by the joint Committee on the Library."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the eighth line, after the word "documents" to insert "whenever he shall be directed by the joint Committee on the Library."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. CORBETT, it was Ordered, That Goldsmith & Brother have leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate their petition and papers.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 537) for the relief of Walter Crane, of Michigan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 159.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope not, because by a kind of consent it was agreed that the banking bill should be disposed of to-day.

Mr. CONNESS. I did not so understand.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have not got through yet with the morning business, and I object to the motion at present, as I desire to introduce a bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion cannot now be entertained but by unanimous consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 538) in addition to an act to regulate the times and manner of holding elections for Senators in Congress; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I now withdraw my objection.

Mr. CONNESS. The objection is withdrawn, and my motion is before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I renew the objection, unless we can arrange that at one o'clock the bill I have referred to shall come up.

Mr. CONNESS. I have no objection to the honorable Senator's bill being taken up at one o'clock, and I will aid him to take it up then, but I hope he will allow us to do some business in the morning hour.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not the slightest objection to taking up the Senator's bill now if the banking bill can be taken up at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is a question which cannot be argued. The objection must either be made or not. Is there any objection to the consideration at this time of the bill mentioned by the Senator from California?

Mr. SHERMAN. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the motion cannot now be entertained. The introduction of bills is in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is no other morning business, I move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 440.

Mr. CONNESS. I thought my motion was pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not pending, because it was objected to.

Mr. CONNESS. I suppose it depends on a vote of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not depend on a vote of the Senate. One objection prevents its being made until the morning business is over.

Mr. CONNESS. The morning business is not over, and I object to the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then that motion cannot be entertained. The introduction of bills and resolutions is in order.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 539) to incorporate the Potomac Navigation Company; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 540) to regulate the sale of hay in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CONNESS. Now, if there be no more morning business, I renew my motion to take up Senate bill No. 159.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The introduction of bills and resolutions is in order, if there be any.

Mr. CONNESS. There do not appear to be any more.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be none, the morning business is through, and the Senator's motion is in order.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 159) relating to the Western Pacific railroad. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that this bill was reported from the Pacific Railroad Committee I think more than three months ago or thereabouts. It has been twice before the Senate, and considered somewhat, but was necessarily laid over on account of the impeachment trial. I wish a vote of the Senate on it. I must be necessarily absent in the beginning of the coming week, and I would regard it as a favor if the Senate would consider the bill now. The bill proposed by the Senator from Ohio we are all for taking up, and it will unquestionably get consideration to-day; and I hope it will not be interposed against this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Upon that motion I de sire to say a word. This is a private bill for the benefit of a railroad company. I have been endeavoring since February last to obtain action upon a bill of great importance to the banking interests of the country, but I have utterly failed up to this time, although it has been reported to the Senate by the unanimous vote of the Committee on Finance, and although it contains provisions of the greatest importance to the banking system, to correct some abuses that are gross and scandalous, and some of its provisions at least ought to receive, and will receive the assent of the Senate. I have been struggling day after day and week after week to get the consideration of the Senate to this bill. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. YATES] gave way on the Colorado bill, with the understanding that I was to call up this bill to-day. Now, it is to be pushed aside with all the other business of the Senate pressing upon us, in order to give to a branch Pacific railroad another gratuity. I ask the Senate whether public measures of great importance ought to be thus thrust aside? The Senator from California no doubt will have an opportunity to get up his bill, but I think I ought to be allowed to present this important public bill now. If it can be assigned as the special order for one o'clock, I do not want to interfere with any other business, but it is manifest that the Committee on Finance cannot get their measures considered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Make that motion, that the banking bill be made the special order for one o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. If that can be done, if the bill I have mentioned, Senate bill No. 440, can be assigned as the special order for to-day at one o'clock, and taken up then, I have no objection to the Senator from California proceeding with his bill. But the idea of comparing a private grant to a railroad company for a depot with a bill which affects the whole circulation of the country, a matter of great public interest, I think is preposterous.

Mr. CONNESS. There can be no objection to the proposition of the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I move that the bill to which I have referred be made the special order for to-day at one o'clock, to be considered as the unfinished business.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope that order will not be made. Last Saturday was set apart for the consideration of bills from the Committee on Commerce, but was devoted to other business; and I desire to ask the Senate to give me to-day for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Commerce. If that is objected to, then I ask the Senate to assign me to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall have no objection to the Senator taking any day after the passage of this bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move, then, that to-morrow be set apart for the consideration of bills from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN. We cannot accumulate motions to make special orders in this way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion really pending is the motion of the Senator from California; which was first in order, to take up his bill; but if there be no objection to assigning one o'clock to-day for the consideration of the bill mentioned by the Senator from Ohio, it can be done. As no objection is made, it will be considered that that order is made.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

WESTERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from California.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 156) relating to the Western Pacific Railroad.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read through.

Mr. CONNESS. The bill has been heretofore read and amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read for information as it stands. We do not know anything about it.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as amended, as follows:

That the Western Pacific Railroad Company of California be, and is hereby, permitted to occupy for the purposes of a depot, store-houses, and other necessary fixtures, so much of the island known as Yerba Buena or Goat Island, in the bay of San Francisco, California, as may, within one year from the time this act shall take effect, be designated by the General of the Army of the United States, with the approval of the Secretary of War, as not being required in time of peace for military purposes; which privilege shall, however, be suspended whenever the United States shall be engaged in war or in imminent danger thereof, and notice of such suspension shall be given to said company, its successors or assigns, by the Secretary of War, with the approval of the President. And in case of such suspension of said privilege it shall be the right of the United States to take possession of the part of said island subject to said privilege, together with all buildings and other fixtures erected thereon by said company, and to occupy and use the same for military purposes during the war, and so long thereafter as shall be deemed necessary by the Secretary of War, with the like approval; and the United States shall pay to said company, their successors or assigns, such sum as may be reasonably due for such use and occupation thereof. The said Western Pacific Railroad Company are also hereby authorized to locate and construct a railroad thence, by the shortest and most practicable route, to a point on its present line at or south of the city of Stockton, and they are hereby enfranchised with all the grants, privileges, and benefits, and made subject to all the conditions of the several acts of Congress relating to the said company and its railroad and telegraph line: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to increase the subsidies in bonds, beyond that accruing under existing lines of location and laws heretofore passed providing for the construction of the Pacific railroad.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I move to amend the bill on page 2, line thirty, by striking out after the word "approval" the following words:

And the United States shall pay to said company, their successors or assigns, such sum as may be reasonably due for such use and occupation thereof.

Mr. President, when the United States give this company so valuable a possession as this, if it shall thereafter for merely temporary use require its occupation, it seems to me that it is a pretty bold proposition to ask that the United States shall pay this railroad company a price for its temporary occupancy, when we give up the whole, a most valuable possession, without any consideration whatever, in addition to what we have heretofore given to this road. I take it that no one will have any objection to the amendment I propose.

Mr. CONNESS. The objection to the amendment is this: the terminus or great depot of the Pacific railroad near the city of San Francisco, to accommodate not only the trade involved in the necessities of the States on the Pacific coast, but also involved in the receipt and shipment of merchandise from the East Indies, which we all hope to be of the greatest extent, will need necessarily very costly constructions in the way of buildings, &c. The probability is that the buildings to be erected and the work to be done at this depot will cost several million dollars to utilize and make it adequate for public business. The question involved here is whether, if the Government in time of war should take possession of all these works and buildings, they should not allow such a rent or allowance as would be fair and equitable for their use. It appears to me that to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Vermont would be to do what the Government has never done in any case that I have any knowledge of. As I stated before when this bill was under discussion, land owned by the Government to such an extent as was needed for so great a public purpose as this, has not been denied to any company or party; and this is a question as to whether the Government shall confiscate, take possession, of the structures reared at an immense expense by this company, without allowing any consideration therefor. Having stated it, as I think, clearly, I am perfectly willing that the Senate shall vote upon it.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish merely to add that the Committee on the Pacific Railroad had this subject under consideration at several meetings, and after reflecting upon it as carefully as they were able they came to the conclusion to report the bill back with the amendment which has been read, out of which the Senator from Vermont proposes to strike the clause which he has moved to strike out. I trust that that motion will not prevail. It will be necessary, as has been remarked by the Senator from California, that this company, if they occupy the island for such a purpose, shall erect buildings which must be considerably costly. What amount it may be necessary for them to expend in the way of storehouses, depots, &c., on the island, of course we cannot now ascertain; but the amount will necessarily be very large.

The effect of the amendment is to authorize the Government in case of war to take possession of the whole of the island and the whole of the buildings which may have been erected by the company upon the island for purposes of their own, and to use these buildings or structures, whatever they may be, for the use and benefit of the United States during the war and until such time after the war as the Secretary of War may find it necessary. I submit to the Senate that to authorize the Government to take possession of these costly buildings and hold them for any considerable time, thus necessarily suspending the business of the company during that time upon the island, would be or might be a very serious damage to the company, and that they ought, fairly and honestly, to be compensated for such a use. No sum is fixed in the bill which is to be paid for such use and occupation. That is to be left for future consideration, and to be settled in such way as Congress at the proper time may see fit to designate. But this bill simply promises to the company on the part of the Government that in case it shall so use the buildings which may be erected upon the island, it will give them a reasonable compensation for the use and occupation of them. I submit that that is nothing more than simple justice.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If that is the only explanation of this provision it does not amount to anything at all. We cannot take property of private citizens under the Constitution of the United States without compensation. This is no concession at all on the part of the company to the United States. In case of war we could go and take possession of it by paying for its use, whether this provision was in the bill or not. I submit that it ought not only to stipulate that there shall be no pay, but even that it shall be free. How much does the Senator from Michigan—I suppose he has investigated the subject—suppose the value of this island to be at the present time? What would it sell for?

Mr. HOWARD. It is not possible to furnish any estimate of the value of the island. It is of no value to any person for agricultural purposes, as I have been informed. It is valuable only as a military station in the harbor of San Francisco, and as a depot for the termination of the Union Pacific railroad. It is impossible, therefore, to answer the question which the Senator puts to me as to the actual value of the island. I beg to say, however, now that I am up, if the Senator will allow me, that the bill itself does not convey to the company the title to the island. The Government does not assume to part with the title to the island to the company, but simply to grant to the company a license to occupy such portion of the island as may not be deemed by the General of the Army of the United States necessary for military purposes, for the erection of store-houses, &c.; subject to be reoccupied by the Government of the United States in time of war.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I have had handed to me by my colleague the report of A. A. Humphreys, brigadier general of engineers, wherein he says:

"The value of this island, over and above the cost of the works necessary to develop it, must be many millions of dollars."

Now, Mr. President, if we do not propose to give the title to this island to this company, but propose to give them its use and occupancy, why should the United States be required to pay rent for it whenever the emergency may arise that they require it, and especially for war purposes? It seems to be admitted by the very face of the bill that it will be so required in case of war, because it is specially provided that in such a case the United States may resume its possession.

Mr. CONNESS. There is one point, if the Senator will permit me—

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to occupy but a moment's time. I merely rose to call the attention of the Senate to this provision. It seems to me that the common judgment of any man should say that this portion of the bill should be stricken out; and I am somewhat surprised that the Senator from California does not concede it. He is generally a fair man. He is not disposed to be very much of a Yankee, to take advantage and get a smart, sharp bargain; and certainly it seems to me that this goes beyond any Yankee operation that I have ever seen yet: that we are to give to this company a possession which in its value is worth hundreds of thousands of dollars every year, and if we shall merely require it for our own temporary occupancy in case of a great emergency we are to be called upon to repay this company to whom we have given so many largesses, so many benefits, the uttermost farthing for any value that we may derive from the use and occupancy of our own property.

Mr. NYE. Being somewhat familiar with the exact location of this island, I desire to say a few words on this subject. The view which the honorable Senator from Vermont takes, it seems to me, is a narrow one, not justified by the facts. In the first place, the outlay upon the island will be several millions of dollars to enable it to be occupied for military purposes by the Government itself; for I assert, with an entire familiarity with its locality, that it is unavailable as a military depot in the sense in which the Government will require it without that outlay being made by the Government itself or by some one else. On one side of the island the channel is very narrow indeed, and without this land connection it will be entirely unavailable, or to a large extent unavailable, for military purposes, and it is good for nothing else. This company agree to go on and make this large outlay, which will not be less than two million dollars certainly, to get upon this island.

There is another view of this case which the Senate of the United States should take, which it seems to me controls it, and I wish to have the attention of the Senate while I state it. The Government has gone on at great expense and aided in the construction of this railroad. To make it available, to make the securities ample upon which the Government rests for the return of the advances made and to be made to construct the road, it needs this terminus to accommodate the public commercial interests of the country. The Senator from Vermont and his constituents are as much interested in it as the people of the State of California or Nevada, and more, for turn this map whichever way you may, the wealth of the West and of the East all centers upon this Atlantic coast. In a commercial point of view, for great commercial convenience to this enterprise and to the shipping interests of the world, this terminus is demanded. It is no gift to this company.

There is another view which I wish to present, and then I shall have done; and that is the point of economy. I think what is now proposed will save the construction of something like forty-seven miles of road. No such convenience for public commerce can be found as upon this island. We have now reached a new era in the commerce of the world. We have seen in the other branch of this Congress, standing in their Hall, within this week, the representatives of a population of four hundred million people, who bring us the fruits of the sun, and they are to find their great depot at this island. It is of national importance to furnish commercial convenience to our great continental enterprise that this island should be so dedicated, and not one inch of the title passes and the Government can reclaim it whenever it is needed for its purposes.

Now, sir, I come to the "Yankee" part of the argument. Being a legitimate descendant of the Yankees I have a right to speak of that branch of the case. Sir, there is no Yankeeism in this. It is broad gauge. As my friend from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] the other day told the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER,] there is no flat-bottom and center-board commerce in this; it is keels that navigate the world.

What does the Government part with? Nothing. It simply gives consent to occupy that portion of the island which it does not require for military purposes. It makes doubly valuable the portion of the island reserved for those purposes. It makes it, indeed, what the Government requires, absolutely defensive in its position; and if it shall become necessary in time of war that the country shall use the whole island it may take it all. This company are willing to say that in that contingency the Government shall take it. Under these limitations I can see no objection to the bill. And now I ask my friend from Vermont is it at all likely that in his day or mine that exigency will arise? No, sir; the power of the arms of this country so demonstrated itself to the world that no nation and no combination of nations will dare invade our soil or create the emergency for which this provision is to provide.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will be adopted, and after that, whether it be adopted or not, I have another one to offer. For the present I simply desire to say that this is a much more important question to the country and to the Treasury of the country than Senators seem to imagine. I have before me a report made by officers of the Engineer corps under the direction of the War Department which shows that this property is indispensably necessary to the defense of the great city of San Francisco. The report says further in regard to its value, that if the Government were disposed to sell it they could get $5,000,000 for it. I have no doubt this is true. As I understand it, the island now above water and the shoal water there may be made to contain three hundred acres of land. After awhile, as the city of San Francisco grows toward its magnitude, for it is growing every year—and I agree with the Senator from Nevada that at some future time it will be one of the great cities of the world—as it progresses the value of this island will every year become greater.

If this island is to be used by a railroad all the railroads which shall terminate in San Francisco ought to have the same right there. You have now the Central Pacific railroad approaching completion; you have the Pacific railroad, eastern division, far advanced toward its termination. I hope that in a year or two we shall have a great Northern Pacific railway started also. All these railroads of course will terminate in San Francisco. There are besides various railroads in the State of California made by private individuals and by the bounty of the State which are approaching this great city. All of them ought to have a portion of this territory, if it is to be granted to any. We have at all our great towns found difficulty in having proper locations for the termini of our roads. They have been constantly changing their depots, because in the early start of their operations they did not know the amount of property they would need, nor where the centers of trade would be.

This is in some measure a new place; and we, the national representatives, ought to do something to make it a place worthy of the great city of which it is to be the entrepôt and of the whole nation that is going to give this bounty. The amendment which I shall offer as soon as this is disposed of, is to give all the railroads which may terminate at San Francisco a right to go there.

It is said by the Senator from Nevada that this is not a Yankeeism. True, for the Yankees always pay for what they get. This is one of those schemes which are to make money out of the Government without giving a compensation for it. The railroad companies in the East have paid for not only the land upon which they erected their depots, but for every foot of the land upon which they built their roads. Here the Government gives the company the soil, gives them the right of way, and pays them for occupying it. It gives to every one of these Pacific railroad companies more than principalities in land, and besides that pays them money enough to make the railroads, and more than enough.

Mr. CONNESS. How?

Mr. CAMERON. By the subsidy. I do not object to that; I vote for these roads because I desire to have the great West and the great Pacific coast settled, and to encourage the people who desire to go to reside there. I desire to see inducements held out to send people across there to populate that great country. But I do not desire to see the Government lose all its property for the benefit of an already bloated corporation, for it is bloated, and all those connected with it are making princely fortunes out of it. Why should they not pay for the ground they use as the terminus of their road, as other corporations have done? Especially should we not allow them to take from the Government an island which, as your engineers say, is absolutely necessary to the defense of the city of San Francisco. It is true that we may not have a war this year or next, and perhaps not in our generation; but ages and generations are but small periods in the history and growth of the world. The time will come when there will be a war there just as sure as time turns round, and then the Government will need this property.

I shall not detain the Senate longer now; but when this amendment is voted on, I shall offer the amendment I have indicated.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear the document read which the Senator from Pennsylvania has in his hands.

Mr. CAMERON. I am much obliged to the Senator for the suggestion, and I send it to the desk and ask that it be read.

Mr. CONNESS. I believe I have the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time has arrived when the special order should be taken up.

Mr. CONNESS. This will only take a few minutes. I have but a few words to say.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator consent to allow a motion to be made that that document be ordered to be printed?

Mr. CONNESS. That document may be printed, and it may be read from end to end; I have no objection; but I hope the Senator will not undertake to jerk me from the floor when I rise.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly not.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I shall only occupy one minute, and then it will be time to stop at present, as the hour for the special order is at hand.

There appears to me to be several holes, so to speak, in the logic of my friend from Pennsylvania. Allow me to let him look through them without the aid of glasses. The whole island, he says, is necessary for war purposes, and therefore it should not be given, or any part of it, to one company, and hence he proposes that it shall be given to all companies; for the honorable Senator has an amendment as long as my arm giving the island for the purposes to all companies.

Mr. CAMERON. The Senator will allow me to correct him. I said if it is given at all it should be given to all of them.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, if the outrage is to be committed of allowing the great Pacific railway to have a depot there, then every railroad in the land must have it, and the outrage must be multiplied and quadrupled!

Mr. CAMERON. That is not logic.

Mr. CONNESS. No, Mr. President, it is not logic. That is what I began to say: I understand what the Senator aims at very well; but if he were as well acquainted with the localities and the demands of these other roads as we happen to be he would not bring forward the amendment which he proposes.

But, sir, I promised not to occupy the time of the Senate, and I intend to abide by that promise. I give notice to the Senate that I shall call this bill up again, perhaps later in the day, when opportunity offers, or to-morrow, and I desire it to be exposed to the closest scrutiny; and I invite the close examination as well as the most forcible arguments of my honorable friend from Pennsylvania to sustain his proposition.

Mr. HOWARD. I merely wish to say, in reply to a suggestion made by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, that if in case it shall turn out that in the judgment of the Secretary of War and the President the whole of this island ought to be retained for military purposes they may so retain it, and this company cannot get a foot of it. The military authorities are to determine the question whether any portion of this island can be spared for the purposes contemplated in the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the document which has been laid on the table by the Senator from Pennsylvania be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. There is a map accompanying it. Let it be printed without the map.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes; the original map can be returned with the printed document.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 601) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1869; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

NATIONAL BANKS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time has arrived for the consideration of the special order.

Mr. CHANDLER. With the leave of the Senator from Ohio, I desire to make the motion which I proposed to make a while ago, that to-morrow be set apart for the consideration of bills from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that motion being made, if it does not lead to debate.

Mr. HARLAN. I shall have to interpose an objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I hope we shall proceed with the regular order.

Mr. HARLAN. I shall want to call up the District business to-morrow.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let the vote be taken on my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves that to-morrow be set apart for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to say something before that question is put.

Mr. SHERMAN. A single objection makes the motion out of order at this time.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I give notice that I shall to-morrow ask the Senate to take up for consideration the bills from the Committee on Commerce. Last Saturday was set apart for those bills, but they then went over, and I shall now ask that to-morrow be substituted.

Mr. SHERMAN. I insist that we go on with the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio calls for the special order, which is the bill (S. No. 440) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864. The pending question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance, to insert the words which will be read after the word "deposits," in line twelve of the first section:

The Chief Clerk read the words proposed to be inserted, as follows:

And the limitation prescribed in section twenty-nine of said act, which restricts the liabilities of individuals, companies, corporations, or firms, for money borrowed of national banking associations to one tenth of the capital of such associations, is hereby made applicable to all deposits made by such associations with the private bankers or brokers or banking associations not organized under the national currency act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the following as the third section of the bill:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That section forty-two of said act be so amended as to provide that within ninety days from the date of the notice served upon the Comptroller of the Currency by any national banking association that its shareholders have voted to go into liquidation as provided in said section, the said association shall pay over to the Treasurer of the United States the amount of its outstanding notes in lawful money of the United States, and take up the bonds which said association has on deposit with the Treasurer for the security of its circulating notes, which bonds shall be assigned to the bank in the manner specified in the nineteenth section of this act; in default of which the Comptroller of the Currency shall sell said bonds to the highest bidder at public auction in the city of New York, and from the proceeds thereof shall pay over to the Treasurer of the United States, in lawful money, an amount equal to the outstanding circulation of such association, and shall pay over any surplus remaining to the officers of the association. And any association which has heretofore gone into liquidation under the provisions of the section to which this is an amendment shall pay over to the Treasurer lawful money equal in amount to its outstanding circulation within thirty days from the date of the passage of this act, in default of which its bonds shall be sold as above provided. And from that time the outstanding notes shall be redeemed at the Treasury of the United States, and the said association and the shareholders thereof shall be discharged from all liability therefor: Provided, That any association winding up its affairs for the purpose of consolidation with another bank shall not be compelled to pay to the Treasurer of the United States the amount of its outstanding circulation in lawful money, nor shall its bonds be sold as above provided.

Mr. CORBETT. I ask the Senator from Ohio what will be the result of this amendment, if it is adopted, in case the Government should return to specie payments and adopt such measures as to redeem its own outstanding notes, the legal tenders. Provision is here made for disposing of the bonds held by banks and paying the amount realized from them in currency to the Government to reimburse it and turning over the balance to the bank. If the Government shall have returned to specie payments so as to redeem its legal tenders in specie at any time, will it not be obliged to redeem those notes with gold? It seems to me that when these bonds are disposed of and national bank bills paid out the Government will be obliged to redeem them. Can it redeem them in bank bills, or will it have to pay gold for them, provided it shall then have no legal-tender notes in circulation? I ask the Senator from Ohio what would be the effect of the amendment in that view.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator will see that no such case can possibly arise, because before the bank can withdraw its bonds it must deposit with the Treasurer lawful money of the United States to the full amount of its circulation. That "lawful money" is not bank notes; "lawful money" is greenbacks or gold. Consequently, if specie payments were resumed, and our notes were as good as gold, they would have to deposit gold, or greenbacks, which would then be equal to gold.

Mr. CORBETT. The question in my mind was whether this section would allow them to deposit other bank bills.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; the section expressly says "the amount of its outstanding notes in lawful money of the United States." "Lawful money of the United States" is a technical term which applies only to legal tenders or gold.

Mr. CORBETT. That was the point I wished to be certain about. I was afraid there might be some doubt as to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. There can be none. The words "lawful money" are sufficiently definite.

Mr. FERRY. In the twelfth line of this amendment there is a reference to "the nineteenth section of this act." I suppose the word "this" should be changed to the word "said."

Mr. SHERMAN. It ought to be "the nineteenth section of said act."

Mr. FERRY. I move that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That modification will be made without a formal vote if there be no objection.

The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HOWE. The amendment says these bonds are to be sold "at public auction." Would that require them to be sold at the regular stock sales?

Mr. SHERMAN. The national bank act provides the mode and manner of selling bonds; it is to be done at public auction. They are sold at the stock exchange, I suppose.

Mr. HOWE. Would they necessarily be sold in that way?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; because the original bank act requires it. This only repeats its language. The provision is that they must be sold in New York at public auction. If the Senator thinks there is any doubt about it, I have no objection to putting in the words "at the stock exchange."

Mr. HOWE. I simply asked the question. There may be public auctions in New York entirely independent of the stock exchange.

Mr. SHERMAN. But I take it the Treasurer of the United States, as a matter of course, would sell these bonds at the place where all such things are sold.

Mr. HOWE. I should think he would.

Mr. SHERMAN. But if the Senator has any doubt about it he may put in the words "at the stock exchange" after the words "public auction."

Mr. JOHNSON. That had better be done.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection.

Mr. HOWE. I think it would be well to put in those words.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well, let them be inserted.

Mr. HOWE. I move to insert the words "at the stock exchange" after "auction."

The amendment to the amendment was adopted.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was to insert the following as the fourth section of the bill:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That there shall be allowed to receivers of national banking associations, appointed in accordance with the provisions of the national currency act, in full compensation for their services, a salary of $1,500 per annum, and in addition thereto a commission of three per cent. upon the first $100,000; a commission of one per cent. upon all sums above $100,000 and not exceeding $500,000, and a commission of one half of one per cent. on all sums over $500,000 that may be collected; which salary and commission shall be paid by the Comptroller of the Currency out of any moneys realized from the assets of the bank so in the hands of the receiver: Provided, That the payment of one half of the commissions may be reserved, in the discretion of the Comptroller, until the affairs of the bank are finally closed. And all receivers, appointed as aforesaid, shall be considered officers or agents of the Government, and shall have the right to bring suits in the United States courts. And the judge of the United States district court for the district in which such suits are brought, shall fix the fees or compensation to be allowed to the attorneys for such receivers, having due reference to the amount of labor performed and to the interests of the creditors of the bank.

Mr. CAMERON. I move to amend the amendment by making "three" in the sixth line "two," "one" in the seventh line "one half;" and "one half" in the ninth line "one quarter," so as to make the commission two per cent. on the first $100,000, one half of one per cent. beyond that up to $500,000, and one quarter of one per cent. on all above $500,000. The amendment of the committee would give a receiver for collecting $100,000, $4,500; my amendment will make it $3,500.

Mr. SHERMAN. So far as I am concerned I have no objection to the Senator's amendment; but I will state the reason why the Committee on Finance proposed the compensation for which the section provides. This compensation is precisely the compensation of the collectors of internal revenue. We copied from the internal revenue act the rates of compensation now fixed by law for such officers. It will be remembered that the Comptroller of the Currency, in calling attention to the necessity of legislation on this subject, says that the courts in the State of New York have allowed five per cent. on all sums, even in one case where the amount of capital involved was $1,200,000, amounting to an extortionate sum. This section is for the purpose of reducing the allowances made by the courts, the fees of receivers being now fixed by the State courts. In arriving at what would be a proper compensation we came to the conclusion that the amount allowed now by law to the collectors of internal revenue would be about fair. The duties to be performed by these officers are generally of a high character, often very difficult. Banks are usually broken on account of frauds or peculations or misconduct, and frequently the assets are very difficult to be collected. It was thought, therefore, that on the amount collected a reasonable commission should be given. If the Senator from Pennsylvania, who knows more about the subject than I do, thinks that $1,500 a year salary, and two per cent. on the first $100,000 collected is sufficient, I shall make no special objection; but the committee considered the matter fully, and came to the conclusion that we had better leave the rates at the amount proposed by the Comptroller of the Currency, being the rates fixed by law for collectors of internal revenue.

Mr. CAMERON. In the case of collectors of internal revenue, it will be remembered that they collect in small sums from various persons in different parts of the district, and sometimes the districts are very large. Here it is all one business and will be done under the same roof. According to my amendment, if $100,000 should be collected, the compensation of the receiver would be $3,500. I think that is sufficient. If the assets are good, they are generally collected almost immediately; and if bad not at all. Then the percentage is increased as the amount enlarges. I think the compensation above $200,000 is too much, even as I propose to leave it; but I am willing to agree to the reduction proposed. My experience in banking has been that when a bank breaks up the gentlemen who settle its affairs generally get pretty much all that is left. I want to save something for the stockholders, if possible.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I know that it is an unthankful and an unprofitable business to undertake to oppose any proposition here to reduce the pay of anybody who is expected to perform public duties; but I very much doubt the propriety of reducing the amount which is specified in this section as a compensation to receivers appointed to settle up the affairs of national banks. I doubt in the first place the propriety of appointing men to discharge responsible duties and then giving them a starvation salary; and it is to that cause as much as to any other that we may attribute the great demoralization that has crept into the public service of this country. We suppose that we are consulting economy when we appoint men to office and deny them a reasonable compensation for their services, when in point of fact we are endangering, not only the Government, but the people generally who are concerned in the transaction of the public business.

To be a receiver, as it seems to me, in settling up the affairs of a delinquent or broken bank, requires not only a business man, but it requires a man who understands questions of law, who can not only engage in the collection of such debts as may be due the bank, but in the adjustment of all legal questions that grow out of the settlement. Now, to provide that such a receiver shall receive only $1,500 a year, and then $2,000 more for collecting $100,000, which would make $3,500 salary for one year's labor, is to provide that no man fit to do the work will undertake it. If a bank was to break in any considerable city, no merchant would undertake the business for that pay; no lawyer would undertake the business for that pay; and you must procure some shyster who expects to make up what he lacks in fees by stealing the assets of the bank. That will probably be the result unless you give to those officers such pay as will induce respectable and honorable men to engage in the business. The courts, while the business has been in their hands of fixing the fees of these officers, have allowed them much more—five per cent. perhaps more than they ought to have received. It may be supposed that a court is honest in this allowance, and that a court understands what is really due a man for the transaction of such business; and a court conversant with the man and the business he has done has allowed much more than this amendment provides.

It seems to me that it is desirable that these persons should be good, honest men, competent men, men in whom the community can confide; and although I am not much of a banker, and know very little about settling up the affairs of broken banks, I did suppose that a receiver had something else to do besides doing business inside of the bank. I supposed that there was usually a large amount of money due to the bank from a great variety of persons, and that it was the business of the receiver to collect the debts due the bank, to marshal the assets, make arrangements for the payment of the debts of the bank, and take the whole responsibility of settling up the business. That I understand to be the duty of a receiver; and although I of course feel no interest in this matter any further than the public is concerned, I think that this compensation is not an unreasonable one, and that we shall not gain anything by reducing it as suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CATTELL. The rate of compensation fixed for receivers by the amendment of the committee is precisely the same as that fixed for collectors of internal revenue, $1,500 per annum salary and the same percentage upon the amount collected. The Comptroller of the Currency recommended this rate himself, and submitted it to the committee, and it was a subject of discussion there. After looking at it in all its aspects, the responsibilities connected with the handling of so much money and the talent required to settle up the affairs of an institution and the integrity and honesty requisite, we thought a receiver ought at least to command as high a salary as that of one of our collectors of internal revenue, and it was with that view that this amount was fixed.

Mr. CAMERON. I endeavored to explain before, but I believe the Senator from New Jersey was not in, that the duties of a receiver are much lighter than those performed by a collector of internal revenue. The latter collects from individuals various sums, small sums and large ones, all over his district; sometimes he has to go all over a congressional district to make the collections. Here it is all done at one place, the banking office, or some house in the town where it is located. I know how difficult it is to succeed here in a proposition to reduce compensation for lawyers, because the Senate is largely composed of lawyers, and they naturally have a sympathy for each other when you talk about reducing the pay of their brethren. It is supposed that a layman, as I was called some time ago, has a prejudice against them; but I am not one of that kind, for I generally pay my lawyers pretty well, though I do not often have to employ them. This is a different affair from ordinary legal business. It requires integrity; it requires a knowledge of accounts; but it does not require any great legal knowledge. A man may not be fit to be chief justice even of the State of Pennsylvania or New York, and yet he may be a very good commissioner to settle up the affairs of a broken bank. I think the compensation is enough if fixed at the rate I propose, which would give for a bank of $500,000 assets $5,250; and I think that is a good sum. It will take him, probably, between two or three months.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAMERON called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. DRAKE. I did not intend to say a word about this matter, but if the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania insists upon having the yeas and nays on his amendment I will say a word or two.

The question presented by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania is whether, when the stockholders of a bank show that they cannot conduct their bank in such a way as to keep it out of liquidation, cannot manage it in such a way as to keep it from breaking, we should put the man that does wind up their affairs upon what the honorable Senator from Oregon has correctly called starvation compensation, in order to save some little for the stockholders. I do not see the thing in any such light. I think if a bank cannot manage its affairs so as to keep out of the hands of a receiver, the receiver ought to be paid a decent compensation for winding up its affairs.

The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania draws a distinction between this case and that of a collector of internal revenue, but he does not state the whole difference. A collector of internal revenue, though he has to collect from a large number of people in different localities, does it through his deputies, while he sits and does nothing, or very little. This receiver has to have everything pass through his own hands, and be individually responsible for everything, from the beginning to the end. I think that the measure of compensation in the bill is perfectly just, and it ought not to be reduced.

Mr. CAMERON. I generally listen with great instruction to my friend, the Senator from Missouri; but this morning, as I think, he is entirely out of the way. He says that because the stockholders of a bank have not been able to manage their affairs, therefore, when some one who is fit gets hold of it, he ought to be paid. The Senator ought to know that stockholders very seldom have much to do with managing the affairs of a bank. If he has ever been a stockholder, as I dare say he has been, he must remember that somebody managed the affairs of the bank, and not himself. It is the shifting of responsibility in banks and other establishments that causes banks and individuals to break.

But the Senator spoke of the collector, and said the collector does his business through deputies. He does to some extent; but much more of his time is employed in his business than a receiver of a bank occupies, because his whole time is given to the duties of his office, and while he has deputies he has himself to travel throughout the district often to make a portion of the collections. It is not so with the receiver who may be employed to do this business. I think the Senator was entirely out of the way this morning. I wish he had gone with me to Pennsylvania last week, and I think he would have different ideas about banking.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania is perfectly aware of that maxim of law which says qui facit per alium facit per se.

Mr. CAMERON. I am no lawyer.

Mr. DRAKE. What a man does through another he does by himself. And if the stockholders elect directors who are not capable of managing the affairs of a bank so as to keep it out of liquidation it is their act; and when they by their own act in electing such men put their bank in liquidation a man that has to take their affairs and wind up the concern ought to be paid at least a decent compensation for doing it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think this amendment ought to prevail, or otherwise the amount should be reduced even more than is proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania. A bank going into liquidation of course has what is known in the bank parlors as live paper; that is, paper that is paid at maturity. The receiver employs his teller to receive this money when paid. He is to get an annual salary of $1,500, and there is no reason on earth why $3,000 should be paid him on the first $100,000 he collects in addition to the $1,500 a year. One per cent. would be a very high rate. Take a bank of $500,000 or $1,000,000 capital; $100,000 would be paid in in three days in the regular course of business, paid to the teller of the bank. Now, tell me why ought this receiver to have three per cent. upon that money which is paid to the teller of the bank in the regular course of business, upon live paper? I desire, if it be in order, to move an amendment to the Senator's amendment, substituting one per cent. in place of the two per cent. which he proposes to insert instead of three per cent. in the section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not in order, as this is an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. The proposed rate is too high altogether. All the live paper of the bank, actual business paper, will be paid at maturity, and paid to the teller, so that there will be no responsibility on the receiver any more than on the president or cashier of any bank.

Mr. DRAKE. Suppose the bank had not gone into liquidation, it would be paying three or four times the amount of this receiver's compensation to its president, cashier, teller, and others just to receive the money on that live paper that comes in without any trouble. And why should you now put the receiver upon such a pitiful footing as that, after paying three or four times the amount to the bank staff to do the same thing?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I do not understand this to be a question between the stockholders and the receiver. It is a question between the creditors of a broken bank and the receiver; between the depositors, in the main, from the men of large business who make large deposits down to the persons who may deposit the savings of their daily labor; it is a question between that class of persons and the receiver, and it is not a question between that class of persons and a lawyer, because if the appointment were left to a wise court a lawyer would not be appointed receiver. A good lawyer, an able lawyer is not fit to be receiver. A man that would make a good collector, to go around and by importunity and persistent efforts collect the debts that are due the bank, would not be likely to be a good lawyer. If the bank has claims that ought to be collected that are disputed, then of course the receiver must employ a lawyer, and he ought to employ a good one, of course, when that case arises. We ought to provide simply for the payment of a reasonable compensation to a careful business man. Perhaps the clerk or cashier of the bank would make a very excellent one. I do not believe in following the policy, when we legislate upon these questions, that is mostly adopted by the wealthy banks. Ordinarily, in the cities, when one of the banks fails, the president of a neighboring bank is appointed the assignee, and of course, as between gentlemen of that grade in the financial world, the little matter of compensation is not to be regarded, and he will receive $10,000 for doing that which some clerk would do for $2,000 much more promptly and efficiently for the benefit of the depositors.

That is my notion about this business, and I shall vote for the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I do not believe that when banks fail all the assets ought to go in the way of costs; they ought to be saved for the benefit of the people who make their little deposits.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if he will not amend his amendment by accepting my suggestion to make the commission one per cent. instead of two upon the first $100,000.

Mr. CAMERON. I am afraid if I accept that amendment I shall lose all. I think we had better take the reduction I have proposed, as we can probably get that.

Mr. CHANDLER. This whole thing is wrong-end foremost. The Senator from Indiana is perfectly correct in his statement that this is a question between the creditors and the receiver rather than between the stockholder and the receiver. A bank that goes into liquidation has very little left, seldom anything, for the stockholders; and it is really a question between the creditors of the bank and the receiver. If you are dealing out strict justice in this matter the arrangement here made should be reversed. The first $100,000 comes in without any care or trouble whatever, and there should not be over one quarter of one per cent. paid on the first $100,000, and then you should increase the rate on subsequent collections; because the bad debts, those that are difficult to collect, are the last to come in, and a higher commission should be paid on those deferred payments that come in at the last end of the collection of the assets. Take a bank of $1,000,000 capital in the city of New York; the first $100,000 would probably be paid in within three days; perhaps the first $500,000 would probably be received within sixty days; within ninety days certainly; and there is no reason on earth why two per cent. should be paid a receiver on that. Take the banks all over the country, and $1,000 is considered a fair salary for a cashier. It is not so in the cities where it is expensive to live; but in the country a large majority of the banks pay salaries less even than to their presidents and cashiers than you propose here as your salary to start with for a receiver.

I hope that the Senator from Pennsylvania will accept my suggestion and amend his proposition to make the commission on the first $100,000 one per cent., and I feel very sure the Senate will vote that that is sufficient compensation.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. President, I concur with the Senator from Michigan that this ought to be reversed. The amendment of the committee provides that on the first $100,000 collected, in which there is really no labor incurred, the receiver shall be allowed three per cent., while upon the last $100,000, where nearly all the labor is incurred, he shall only receive one half per cent., and under the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania he would receive less than that.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend will allow me to explain—

Mr. CORBETT. I wish to suggest that after the first $100,000 is collected, and you get to the small percentage, the person who is intrusted with the collection may resign his office and say that he cannot afford to wind up the affairs for the compensation allowed.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator has evidently got on the wrong tack. This discrimination is simply that in the small banks, where the assets are $100,000, the compensation shall be $4,500 or $3,500, as proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania; and where it is a very large bank the lower rates of percentage operate upon the very large sums collected. I will state also that in order to prevent the receiver from resigning when he has collected the cream of the assets we have inserted a provision that one half the commissions shall be retained until the whole matter shall be closed up, so that there is no object in being receiver for a while and then retiring. One half the gross commissions are to be kept back until the whole matter is settled up.

Mr. CORBETT. I did not read the provision in that manner. Where is that inserted?

Mr. SHERMAN. In line fourteen:

Provided, That the payment of one half the commissions may be reserved in the discretion of the Comptroller until the affairs of the bank are finally closed.

Mr. CORBETT. "In the discretion of the Comptroller." If the Comptroller does not reserve that one half, the receiver, after collecting the first one or two hundred thousand dollars, can resign his office and receive the large commission. It may be that if the Comptroller was required to reserve one half, it would be sufficient to prevent the receiver resigning before closing up the affairs of the institution; but it seems to me that if a person appointed receiver was not competent to close up the affairs, he would be very likely to resign, or the institution desire that he should resign, and then he would be entitled to the large commissions on the first one or two hundred thousand dollars. If he should conduct himself in such a manner as to prove him to be incapable, those interested would desire that he should resign, and that somebody else should be placed in his position, and in that event the incompetent person would get a larger amount than the next person who came in and had the greatest trouble and did the most work. I think the system should be reversed, and the larger commissions paid upon the last amounts collected.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I am inclined to think that the Senator from Pennsylvania is entirely right in the proposition which he makes. In the first place, it is not true that the receivers of these banks perform even the services attributed to them by the Senator from Michigan. Receivers appointed by courts in cases of small insolvencies, do personally very often, and usually superintend and transact the business; but one of these receivers practically does no such thing. He gives a bond and assumes the responsibility, and then one of the first things he does is to retain an attorney, and this very section provides that the court is to allow him the expense of the attorney. The next thing he does is to have a book-keeper, or clerk, or both, and the book-keeper or clerk is the visible presence of the receivership. The receiver is responsible, but the business is transacted by other persons who are paid aside from this commission, for doing it.

I understood some Senator to speak of the impropriety of establishing starvation prices for the benefit of the stockholders of an insolvent bank. What distinction is that which occurs to any mind? Who are the stockholders of an insolvent bank? They are innocent persons whose trustees and representatives have wrecked their investment; and I should like to know what class of creditors are more meritorious than they? They are simply the cestui que trusts of a trust fund; and if strict morals in law is not demanded in their case, for whose benefit, I inquire, is it demanded? They are as meritorious as bill-holders, and no creditors of a bank are more meritorious than they. A man who in good faith invests his money in a bank, and then committing it to a board of directors is so unfortunate as to lose it through the recreancy of a cashier or president, or the carelessness of somebody else which does not attach to him, is, I repeat, as meritorious a creditor, and a person having rights as sacred as any pecuniary rights which you can respect. Therefore I submit that this compensation ought to be fixed at what are called starvation prices; that is at the lowest figure which is remunerative, and that I submit is as low a sum as the Senator from Pennsylvania proposes, when you remember that the real business is transacted by attorneys, book-keepers, and clerks, who are paid aside from the compensation given to the receiver.

Mr. MORTON. I believe with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] that very low salaries are the cause of much dishonesty in the administration of the Government. In other words, I believe that very low salaries for places where first-rate abilities are required, instead of being economical, are the dearest and most costly way of carrying on the Government. I make that as a general remark; and now I would submit to the Senator from Pennsylvania himself if you can get a man who has the character, who can give the bond, a heavy bond being required, and who is qualified to undertake a business of this kind and assume the responsibility, for a less compensation than is proposed by the Finance Committee. You cannot. You do not want a cheap man to undertake to settle up the business of a bank with a million of assets. In the first place, the cheap man could not give the bond. You want a man who can give the bond, and who has a character that will warrant the assurance that the business will be done honestly. The amount of bond required is as the Comptroller shall direct.

Take the case of a bank where the assets are $1,000,000. I ask if you can find a man who is able to give the bond required, who is competent, who by his character can be trusted, who has the business ability, who will undertake to settle up the assets of that bank for less than $10,000? and that is about all he could get under the amendment of the committee. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] says it would be only about nine thousand dollars. I say there is no competent man who will undertake to settle up the affairs of a bank involving $1,000,000, with all its responsibility, its trouble, and its anxiety, for less than $9,000. Such a man cannot be found.

Mr. CAMERON. I beg the pardon of the Senator from Indiana for interrupting him; but I will put this case to him: he is a lawyer living in the town of Indianapolis, following his profession, a man of ability and integrity; would he not undertake the settlement of the affairs of a bank in the city of Indianapolis for $9,000? It would not certainly take him a year to settle it up; and it would not interfere with his other business, for he could practice his profession at the same time. Then he should remember that the expenses of a receiver in the employment of a clerk, &c., are allowed.

Mr. MORTON. A lawyer who would undertake for the sum of $9,000 to settle up the affairs of a bank the assets of which are estimated at $1,000,000 would, I think, be regarded as a very cheap kind of lawyer, as a man who estimated his own services at a very low rate. I do not think I would undertake it at all, unless I was out of business.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Allow me to suggest that I do not think my colleague would make a very good receiver. He is too able a lawyer for the place.

Mr. MORTON. I thank my colleague for the compliment; but I will say this, that if I were qualified for the business, whether as a lawyer or a merchant, I would not undertake that sort of responsibility and labor for a less sum than is provided by the amendment of the committee, unless I was out of business, was hard up, and had to do something to make a living for my family.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very hard up?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, very hard up. Now, sir, I believe in paying men according to the responsibility and the character of the business they are called upon to do. The idea of a man undertaking to do a business involving the settlement of $1,000,000 for the same rate of compensation for which a clerk would be employed who has a regular and certain vocation is contrary to all our notions of the dispatch of responsible business.

If I was a stockholder in a bank, or if I was a creditor of a bank, and that bank had to be wound up in the way pointed out by this bill, I would rather pay a good compensation to the collector, and have him a responsible and first-class man, than to employ a cheap man at a low compensation and take the risk of having the whole thing fail and losing what I had in it. I think the compensation fixed by the committee is small enough in view of the responsibilities to be incurred.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I think attorneys ought to have a fair price for their labor, and I think receivers ought to have; but I respectfully submit that the Senator from Indiana marks his services rather too high. I do not want to underbid any of my brethren in the profession, but I do feel called upon to say, in the interests of my family who are suffering somewhat, that I will take this business of winding up all the national banks at something less than ten thousand dollars on the million. [Laughter.] It would amount to just $3,000,000 that would come into my pocket at that rate of compensation, and then the additional fees which are to be adjusted by the courts would enable me to hire every lawyer on this floor, secure every particle of professional and personal responsibility there is here, and pay for it. I think under these circumstances I should be willing, being backed up by all this professional talent and professional responsibility, to take $3,000,000 for my share; in fact, a little less than that. So I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

But I rose to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to one point. I understood the chairman, the Senator from Ohio, to say that to guard against the consequences of a resignation on the part of a receiver after he had collected a portion of the assets, they have authorized the Comptroller to retain a portion of the commissions until the work is closed up. If that is the purpose of the provision, it seems to me that some addition will have to be made to it, because while it authorizes the Comptroller to retain a portion of the commission until the job be closed, it does not leave him any sort of discretion as to what to do with those commissions.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to the Senator that I have already a memorandum prepared on the bill before me for the addition of a few words to carry out the purpose in that respect.

Mr. HOWE. I merely wanted to call attention to that point.

Mr. CORBETT. I think that to meet the case, as stated by the Senator from Ohio, the provision ought to read something in this way: that the commission allowed shall be three per cent. upon the capital of a bank whose capital does not exceed $100,000; two per cent. upon the capital of a bank whose capital exceeds $100,000 and does not exceed $200,000; one and one half per cent. upon the capital of a bank of $200,000 and not exceeding $400,000, and so on, fixing the amount according to the capital of the bank instead of three per cent. upon the first $100,000 collected and a less amount on the subsequent sums collected, because it is evident to my mind that the most difficult portion of the collections is upon the amounts that are collected after the first $100,000 or $200,000. For instance, where the capital of a bank is $500,000, the first $100,000 will be collected with comparative ease, while the next $300,000 will be very difficult to collect. I think the provision ought to be amended in the way I suggest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] to the amendment of the Committee on Finance, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Edmunds, Ferry, Fowler, Harlan, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, McCreery, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Stewart, Tipton, Vickers, and Yates—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Conness, Corbett, Doak, Little, Drake, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Ross, Sherman, Sumner, Thayer, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Dixon, Grimes, Henderson, Morrill of Maine, Norton, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Saulsbury, Sprague, Trumbull, and Wade—12.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will now offer an amendment to carry out the idea of the Senator from Oregon. I move, at the end of line sixteen of the pending amendment of the committee, to insert the words "which sum"—referring to the half allowance reserved—"shall be paid to the receiver, or in case more than one receiver has acted, shall be apportioned among the several receivers by the Comptroller of the Currency, according to equity."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CORBETT. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that the Comptroller should be directed to retain the one half, and therefore, in line fifteen, the word "may" should be stricken out and the word "shall" be inserted, so as to require the Comptroller to reserve one half.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendment as it is leaves to the Comptroller the distribution of this fund, and it is scarcely worth while for us to interfere by any peremptory direction.

Mr. CORBETT. I merely make the suggestion.

Mr. SHERMAN. There may be cases where the full amount should be paid to the old receiver. I would rather leave it to the Comptroller.

Mr. FERRY. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "courts," in the nineteenth line, the words:

And may invest the assets of the bank in their hands in bonds of the United States while the affairs of the bank are in process of liquidation, which bonds shall be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, subject to the order of the Comptroller of the Currency; and the receivers shall also make report to the Comptroller of all their acts and proceedings, and the Comptroller shall be authorized to sell such bonds from time to time, in order to make the dividends and payments provided for in the fiftieth section of the act to which this act is supplementary.

The object of the amendment is to provide for an injustice in the practical operation of the present law. The fiftieth section now provides that all moneys received by the receiver in his administration of the affairs of a bank shall be paid over to the Treasurer of the United States, subject to the order of the Comptroller of the Currency, and that he shall make a report to the Comptroller of the Currency of all his acts and proceedings. The effect of this is that where the affairs of a bank are a long time in the process of liquidation—and they are frequently years, growing out of litigation—during the period of settlement the assets are deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, and if they are used at all the Government gets the interest upon those assets instead of that interest going to the stockholders, where it ought to go. I know of banks in process of liquidation, receivers appointed, where the receivers are now in litigation which must occupy periods of from two to five years. They are unable to invest the assets in their own hands, compelled to pay them over to the Treasury, where they lie idle; and thus, when the affairs of the bank are finally closed and the dividends declared, and what balance remains is ready to be paid over to the stockholders, the amount which might have been received by an investment in Government bonds, as provided for in this amendment, is lost to the stockholders.

Applications have been made to the Comptroller of the Currency to ascertain whether the receivers might, instead of paying over the cash, invest these assets in Government bonds, so that the income of these bonds might go to the stockholders when the bank is finally wound up; and they have been informed that as the law now stands there is no other course but to pay over the assets and let them lie idle. It has seemed to me, therefore, that this was a proper place in this bill to make an amendment to the law which is just and equitable, and, indeed, necessary to the true interests of the stockholders in insolvent banks.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not like to make amendments here without careful examination; but I do not see myself any objection to this proposition. It simply enables the creditors of the bank to get the interest on the money while it is in process of liquidation.

Mr. FERRY. That is all there is of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to it. The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was to insert the following as the fifth section of the bill:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That section twenty-two of the act aforesaid be so amended that the maximum limit of national circulation fixed by said act is hereby increased the sum of $20,000,000, which amount shall be issued only to banking associations organized in States and Territories having a less circulation than five dollars per each inhabitant, and so as to equalize the circulation in such States and Territories in proportion to population.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the amendment by striking out all after the words "sum of," in the fourth line, and inserting:

One hundred million dollars, and in issuing such circulating notes preference shall be given to banking associations in States and sections of the country not adequately supplied with banking facilities. But whenever the amount of United States notes and circulating notes of national banks combined shall be in excess of $700,000,000, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to retire and cancel United States notes to the extent of such excess until the whole amount of United States notes outstanding shall be reduced to $300,000,000.

And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of facilitating the resumption of specie payments the interest received by each banking association upon bonds owned and deposited with the Treasurer of the United States by such banking association shall be held as a reserve fund until the said banking association shall redeem in coin the currency issued by it; and the said specie reserve fund shall be used for no other purpose than for the redemption of said currency.

Mr. SHERMAN. Perhaps, in anticipation of the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts on his amendment, I had better state the reasons why the Committee on Finance reported this particular section, and withheld for the present any action upon the important questions raised by the amendment now offered by him. I appeal to the Senator whether, under the circumstances, he ought to open the whole currency question, as his amendment undoubtedly does? There is the same division in the Committee on Finance in regard to the question of currency, the relations of bank notes and United States notes that there is in the Senate and among the people of the country. After fully considering the matter we thought it best, in the midst of a heated political excitement, to avoid discussion of the whole question of currency which will be presented by this amendment, and which is necessarily involved in it. There are other bills lying on your table which involve the question. There is a bill which proposes to deal with the public debt, another which proposes to establish a free banking law, and contains the substantial provisions embraced in this amendment.

Now, is it wise at this period of the session, in the midst of an election campaign involving grave political issues, for us to commence the discussion of this question? If it is, as a matter of course each Senator will have his own project; and if the Senate determine that they will open this whole question the Committee on Finance will present their views and submit their amendments. In order to save the time of the Senate, I may as well state now as hereafter the reasons why the committee offered this section.

There has been great complaint in the western and southern States in regard to the distribution of the national bank circulation. The amount is now limited to $300,000,000, and the limit has been reached, so that not one dollar of circulation can be issued to any new bank. This limit was fixed in the midst of a war, when eleven States could not get any of the banking circulation because they were rebel States involved in the war. It was done, also, at a time when in the western States, for want of means and facilities, and because of the high price of money, it was impossible to organize banks. This has created in the western and southern States great complaint. It has been especially pointed out by the people of the West that the States of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut have from fifty to seventy dollars of banking circulation for each inhabitant, while other States have less than five dollars per inhabitant, so that there is gross inequality in the distribution of this banking circulation. As a matter of course, we all feel the necessity of avoiding this popular clamor.

During the last Congress, when the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] was chairman of the Committee on Finance, we had the whole subject under discussion. We had several bills proposing to deal with the equalizing of the currency of the national banks, and, after the most grave consideration, we found it very difficult to deal with. Perhaps the most proper way would be to withdraw some circulation from the States that have an excess and give it to those who have too little; but that would create embarrassment and confusion. It might cause distress to withdraw the banking circulation from Massachusetts, Connecticut, and other States, although there are some States that have less than five dollars per inhabitant. The Committee on Finance, after the most full reflection, have come to the conclusion that we ought to satisfy, to some extent, the demand of the western and southern States for additional banking circulation. We therefore propose to give to those States that have the least a small addition to their circulation. I have a table here which gives the banking circulation in each State at the present time, and it appears that Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut have twice or three times the amount they are fairly entitled to, and the State of New York has about twice the amount it is entitled to.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator explain what he means by these States having more than they are entitled to?

Mr. SHERMAN. They have more than they are entitled to on the basis of the law, and I will explain in a moment what I mean by it. In my judgment, the Comptroller of the Currency made a great mistake in ever disregarding that provision of the law which required the national banking circulation to be distributed, one half according to population, and the other half according to resources. But I do not want to go into that question, and I make no complaint of anybody. There are some States that have less than five dollars of circulation per inhabitant, and less than one half their share upon any basis whatever which you can take; and it is but fair that they should have some addition. The States that will be benefited by the amendment of the committee, and get a slight addition to their circulation, are Virginia, West Virginia, Wisconsin, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Kentucky, Tennessee, Louisiana, Mississippi, Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Arkansas, Alabama, Oregon, and Texas. These States have in some cases as low as forty-two, sixty-eight, and thirteen cents of circulation to each inhabitant. We propose to distribute among them $20,000,000 of circulation, which will give them all some banking facilities, and in the States where they need them most. It should, also, be remembered that these western States have been largely increasing since the census of 1860. The apportionment was on the basis of the population in 1860, but the western States have increased much more rapidly than the eastern States since then, and that makes the inequality still more gross.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio if he supposes that in the distribution of the additional $20,000,000, provided for in this section, any single western State will get an additional dollar of banking capital?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. HOWE. It would take the whole of the $20,000,000 to bring the southern States up to an equality with the lowest of the western States, as low as they are.

Mr. SHERMAN. But the Senator will observe that in some of the southern States they may not be prepared to furnish the necessary capital. Twenty millions of circulation, in the opinion of the Comptroller of the Currency—and after examination we thought so—will give to each of the States I have named some additional relief, not very much. The amount of $20,000,000 to be distributed is not very large; but there are objections to increasing the amount beyond $20,000,000, because if you go beyond that you raise the very question which the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts now raises. If you propose to increase the amount more than twenty millions, many persons who are opposed to an inflation of the currency would think that in accomplishing a good thing we were doing an evil thing by raising the question of too great an issue of paper money. We all felt that no considerable increase of the banking circulation ought to be made until bank notes were equivalent to par in gold. All the committee propose to do is simply to answer a popular and equitable demand of some of the States for some additional banking circulation. My own opinion is that if it were confined to the southern States alone, probably not more than $10,000,000 would be absorbed until we can consider this whole matter. As Senators see, this is a temporary measure to answer a popular demand which is now a cause of great complaint. If we give this small relief, and the great and difficult questions of currency and finance go over until the next session, we may then be able to deal with them.

The Committee on Finance, under the circumstances, thought it better to give to these States that have so small an amount of circulation, some relief, little as it is, and leave the great questions of free banking, of a general increase of the banking system, of bank notes taking the place of United States notes, of the relative proportions of United States notes and bank notes, to be decided when we are all calm, after the results of the popular election. If these reasons are not sufficient, and the Senator's amendment prevails, as a matter of course it will open the whole subject, and I shall be prepared to propose various modifications.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, it is true that the proposition I have made opens the question of the currency, but I found it open when I made the proposition. The committee opened it $20,000,000, and I propose to open it $100,000,000. That is the difference between us, with the exception that I do not propose to inflate the currency, whereas the committee propose to do so to the extent of $20,000,000.

The Senator says the committee have reported in favor of this addition of $20,000,000 to the national bank circulation, because there is complaint of inequality. Sir, there is complaint of inequality, and there will be after we give the $20,000,000, though perhaps not so much complaint then as there is at the present time. This addition of $20,000,000 will do very little to equalize the circulation. The New England States, New York, and Pennsylvania, with a population of less than one third of the country, have more than two thirds of the national bank circulation. There is complaint about this inequality, and there will continue to be complaints about it until some plan of equalization is adopted. If our banks redeemed their notes in specie I should be in favor of a free banking system. It is the only sound policy. As we have not reached specie payments, we propose to regulate the amount of bank circulation.

The committee propose to increase the national bank circulation by the addition of $20,000,000, and of course to inflate the currency to that amount. My amendment proposes an addition of $100,000,000 to that circulation, to go to the States which are not adequately supplied with banking capital, and to withdraw $100,000,000 of greenbacks.

Mr. CATTELL. No.

Mr. WILSON. Yes; I propose to have only a total circulation of $700,000,000.

Mr. CATTELL. We have now a combined circulation, United States notes and national bank notes, of only $645,000,000.

Mr. WILSON. In drawing the amendment I went on the assumption that the circulation was $700,000,000. We have $300,000,000 of bank-note circulation, and may have a circulation of $400,000,000 of legal-tender notes. I have no idea that any of the national bank circulation is to be withdrawn from any portion of the country. We were forced into this system by the needs of the country. We had $60,000,000 of banking capital in the State of Massachusetts when the war began. We received from it into our State treasury $600,000 a year in the way of taxes. We freely turned our State banks into national banks. We were pressed to do it, and we acted promptly. The same is true of the older States, and consequently they received more than their proportion of the national bank circulation of $300,000,000. Sir, I wish every legal-tender note could be converted into banking capital, and the banks forced to enter upon the policy of redeeming their bills in specie. Let us compel them to keep the specie they receive from this Government and use it for no other purpose but redemption. The banks are making large profits now, and will do so if we impose this condition upon them. It would be the beginning of a movement for returning to specie payments.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I propose to amend the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, by offering the following as a substitute, to come in at the end of section five.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The Senator's amendment will be in order when this amendment is disposed of. The pending amendment is an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let it be read, that we may hear what it is.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will read what I propose. It is to add to the section:

And upon the issue of any increased national circulation provided for in this section the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to permanently withdraw an equal amount of United States notes.

Mr. President, if it shall be the sense of the Senate, in conformity with the views of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, not to raise great financial questions at the present time, I insist that we shall place this measure before the country so that it shall neither increase nor diminish the amount of circulation now in existence. I understood at the time we passed the resolution restraining the Secretary of the Treasury from further withdrawing any part of the United States notes, that there was no member of the Senate, not even the chairman of the Committee on Finance, who would go for the increase of a single dollar more of circulation. Now it is proposed to increase the amount of banking circulation to the extent of $20,000,000. I do not object to that under the circumstances, provided we can withdraw an equal amount of United States notes.

Mr. President, there is no more imperious duty resting upon Congress at the present moment than to provide some way by which we can escape from the evils of an irredeemable paper currency. If the Senate are not prepared for a more rapid progress, let them institute free banking to take the place of our United States notes; but I do not believe that at the present moment we are prepared to mature such a system as will receive a majority of the votes of this body, or the other, at the present session.

I admit the inequality of the amount of circulation that is now held by the various States. It is reasonable and proper that we should supply the southern States with some means by which they can move their crops. At the present moment they are entirely destitute of any banking capital except in a very limited number of points. I do not suppose that all this amount will be required by the southern States; but if it were, I think they would have a right to monopolize it in preference to any other States. But if we grant this, shall we not come back to the principle of retiring an equal amount of United States notes?

I know it may be said that we are withdrawing a circulation that now bears no interest and issuing another that will bear interest. Mr. President, if that argument is valid to-day, there never can come a time when it will not be valid. If the argument is good to-day for not withdrawing the greenback currency, because it is of no cost to the Government of the United States, that argument will exist forever. I should regret to see the Senate taking a course that would seem to sanction such a policy as that.

I have expressed on former occasions my opinion in relation to this subject, and I do not propose to go into any argument now in relation to the impolicy of an irredeemable paper currency as it affects our industrial interests, or as it affects taxation or our expenditures. They are sufficiently obvious. But I do insist that if we are to launch this measure we shall launch it in such a way that we shall not raise the question as to whether we are inflating or diminishing the currency; that we shall do as much in one direction as the other. I should be glad to do very much more; I think it would be for the best interests of the country if we could do very much more; but I do not propose to occupy the time of the Senate. I have said all I desire to say on the subject.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the question. The Chair understood the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to be an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts—

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I understand it is not now in order, being an amendment in the third degree, and therefore I withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair now finds that the Senator from Vermont moved an amendment to that portion of the bill proposed to be stricken out, and therefore it is in order, and is before the Senate, because it proposes to amend that portion which the Senator from Massachusetts proposes to strike out.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Then I offer the amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I hope the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts will be rejected, because it is a direct proposition to inflate the currency, and that to a very considerable amount.

Mr. WILSON. I have modified it in that respect.

Mr. CONKLING. Suppose we hear it read as it is modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment immediately before the Senate is the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. CONKLING. I am aware of that, but I should like to hear the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, as modified, read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment, as modified, is to strike out all of section five after the word "of," in the fourth line, and to insert:

One hundred million dollars; and in issuing such circulating notes preference shall be given to banking association in States and sections of the country not adequately supplied with banking facilities. But whenever the amount of United States notes and circulating notes of national banks combined shall be in excess of $650,000,000, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to retire and cancel United States notes to the extent of such excess until the whole amount of United States notes standing shall be reduced to $250,000,000.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, so modified it is a proposition to inflate only to the amount of $5,000,000, as I understand it; that is, the difference between $645,000,000, the amount of currency now said to be outstanding, and $650,000,000, the amount proposed, and to substitute for a non-interest bearing currency national bank currency which indirectly bears interest, six per cent. being paid upon the bonds upon which it is based. The same objection is applicable, also, to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Vermont, as that amendment provides for retiring United States notes in the same act by which we issue national bank currency, and for retiring an amount equivalent to the issue; and thus a currency which costs interest is to be put afloat to the amount of $20,000,000. It is true, no doubt, that it is to be based upon bonds already in existence, and so the interest account of the Government is not to be increased, unless bonds are to be issued and sold to get the $20,000,000 United States notes which are to be retired. Should this be necessary it does create a fresh interest account against the Government upon the whole issue proposed.

I rose, however, to avail myself of the liberty which other Senators have assumed, to say a word generally in reference to financial management. Considerable animadversion has been made in this Chamber, and in the country, upon the fact that the present Congress has not dealt with the question of funding the public debt; and to this particular point public attention has been largely attracted. Observers suppose that with an easy money market, and with securities of the Government maturing which are to be met by payment, the Secretary of the Treasury is issuing bonds bearing six per cent. interest, payable in coin, equivalent to eight per cent. in currency, with exemption from taxation equal to upward of one per cent. more. This is thought a singular anomaly, when we consider the confidence established all over the world now in the stocks of the United States.

I was a listener recently to a conversation in which persons of some financial experience took part, at which this question was considered, and at which the suggestion was made that this was not in any respect the fault of Congress, that it did not arise from a want of legislation, and that the Secretary of the Treasury had now all the power that could be properly conferred upon him to adapt the bonds he might issue to the best terms to be obtained in the money market. This suggestion was met by a denial—by a statement that the country constantly sustained a loss in this behalf, and that the loss was owing to the laches or default of Congress. It was asserted that the Secretary had no power, when making bonds for sale, to do anything except to issue six per cent. gold-bearing bonds, with at most a fragment of unexpended power remaining in reference to ten-forty bonds, a very limited amount, and that in no event could he issue a security free from a condition making it redeemable at the option of the Government at an early day, nor one the principal and interest of which were both payable in coin. For lack of these and other powers it was said he was constantly compelled to place the Treasury at a disadvantage in the market. If these things be true, if Congress in ignorance, in carelessness, or in willfulness, has gone thus far and done nothing, with such a duty before it, I hold myself responsible, amenable to great blame, as the humblest member of this body, for not giving my action to a matter which I should hold to be of overmastering importance. But, sir, I repel this charge of responsibility altogether. I deny that any part of the responsibility belongs to Congress. I venture to say that no legislative provisions could make the Secretary more absolutely master of the situation than he is now. No discretion more absolute, no option more unchecked, no position more unembarrassed could well be assigned to a financial officer than that which under the law the Secretary has now, to go into the markets, not of our own country merely, but of the world, and negotiate any security which he sees fit to devise, payable at any time not distant more than forty years, payable the principal in coin and the interest in coin, or either alone payable in coin, and bearing such rate of interest, not more than six per cent. in coin nor more than seven and three tenths in currency, as he is able to adopt, and still negotiate the security he issues. If this be so, Mr. President, am I not right in saying that Congress is entitled to be acquitted of all blame, if blame there be, although the acquittal of Congress should be the conviction of the Secretary of the Treasury?

I wish to call attention to the act of March 3, 1865, the first and second sections of which I beg to read:

"Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to borrow, from time to time, on the credit of the United States, in addition to the amounts heretofore authorized, any sums not exceeding in the aggregate $600,000,000, and to issue therefor bonds or Treasury notes of the United States, in such form as he may prescribe; and so much thereof as may be issued in bonds shall be of denominations not less than fifty dollars, and may be made payable at any period not more than forty years from date of issue, or may be made redeemable, at the pleasure of the Government, at or after any period not less than five years nor more than forty years from date, or may be made redeemable and payable as aforesaid as may be expressed upon their face; and so much thereof as may be issued in Treasury notes may be made convertible into any bonds authorized by this act, and may be of such denominations—not less than fifty dollars—and bear such dates and be made redeemable or payable at such periods as in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury may be deemed expedient. And the interest on such bonds shall be payable semi-annually; and on Treasury notes authorized by this act the interest may be made payable semi-annually, or annually, or at maturity thereof; and the principal or interest, or both, may be made payable in coin, or in other lawful money: Provided, That the rate of interest on any such bonds or Treasury notes, when payable in coin, shall not exceed six per cent. per annum; and when not payable in coin shall not exceed seven and three tenths per cent. per annum; and the rate and character of interest shall be expressed on all such bonds and Treasury notes: And provided further, That the act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, shall be so construed as to authorize the issue of bonds of any description authorized by this act. And any Treasury notes or other obligations bearing interest, issued under any act of Congress, may, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and with the consent of the holder, be converted into any description of bonds authorized by this act; and no bonds so authorized shall be considered a part of the amount of $600,000,000 hereinbefore authorized.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury may dispose of any of the bonds or other obligations issued under this act, either in the United States or elsewhere, in such manner and at such rates and under such conditions as he may think advisable, for coin, or for other lawful money of the United States, or for any Treasury notes, certificates of indebtedness, or certificates of deposit, or other representatives of value which have been or may be issued under any act of Congress; and may, at his discretion, issue bonds or Treasury notes authorized by this act in payment for any requisitions," &c.

Mr. President, I stop here to analyze briefly these sections before reading the succeeding act by which they are preserved and kept in force, and by which they live to-day for every purpose for which I have cited them. It will be observed, in the first place, that these provisions relieve the Secretary from all obligation to make bonds in form redeemable at the option of the Government at any period prior to their maturity. He may make them payable "at any period not more than forty years from date of issue." That is important because of the suggestion that one respect wherein Congress is in default is failing to clothe the Secretary with power to divest bonds of an early redeemability, which was supposed to impair their availability in the market.

I call attention next to the fact that bonds may be made payable—"the principal or interest, or both"—"in coin," so that if there be any virtue in the fact that one act of Congress expressly authorized the issue of ten-forty five per cent. bonds, payable principal and interest in coin, here is the same provision. It may be nominated in these bonds as it is nominated in this statute that the whole debt, principal and interest, shall be payable in coin, and in nothing else.

Third, I call attention to the fact that as to the amount of interest there is no limit or condition, excepting that it shall not exceed six per cent.

Mr. HOWE. In coin.

Mr. CONKLING. In coin. I am speaking of coin-bearing bonds. I thank the Senator for the suggestion, in coin. If it is currency, it may be seven and three tenths per cent. Therefore, observe, Mr. President, that the Secretary may feel the pulse of the market all the time. If he can float a five per cent. bond, he is at liberty to issue it. If he can float a five per cent. bond at twenty years, he is at liberty to issue it. If a bond for forty years will be better he can issue that. If he can negotiate a bond at three or four per cent., with a feature of early redeemability, he is at liberty to issue it, or he may make it payable at its maturity, and not before, and the whole of it absolutely in coin, or the interest alone in coin.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my friend permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to inquire how the Secretary of the Treasury, or anybody else, can float a bond, bearing less than six per cent. in coin, so long as the public have a legal right to make use of seven-thirty notes in conversion into five-twenty coin-bearing six per cent. bonds? Does not the law now authorize every holder of a seven-thirty note to convert it into a five-twenty bond? And if it does, how could anybody be induced to take a less than six per cent. bond, when all he would have to do in order to get one would be to buy a seven-thirty note and convert it.

Mr. CONKLING. My honorable friend diverts me from the line of remark I was pursuing by a suggestion less pertinent than those he ordinarily makes. In the first place, I am not referring to bonds issued by the Secretary of the Treasury to the holders of seven-thirty notes. I am not speaking of bonds which holders of other securities have a right to demand. It is said that the Secretary is issuing five-twenty six per cent. bonds to retire compound-interest notes and three per cents., and for other purposes aside from converting the seven-thirty notes. The hypothesis, therefore, upon which the Senator bases his question is not the one before us.

But, again, the Senator will observe that I am discussing the question simply whether there is a legislative cure for the high interest complained of. It is not within the scope of my remarks to inquire whether the nature of the case admits of any improvement in the management of the finances; I am only arguing that the evil does not consist in a failure to legislate, and that Congress cannot provide a remedy. I am discussing not a financial question, not the feasibility of funding the debt at a lower rate of interest, but the naked question whether Congress is to blame because it is not done.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is to say—

Mr. CONKLING. I will state what I mean fully, if my friend will pardon me, as well without as with interruption.

I am discussing the question whether Congress, by legislation, can do more than it has done to invest the Secretary with power to adapt the securities he issues to the demands of the market, and whether his failure to make better bargains for interest than he does is owing to a want of authority to gauge time, interest, and character of bonds. This is the whole of my inquiry. Thus the Senator will see, I think, that the suggestion he makes is not at all pertinent to the line of my inquiry; he will, I am sure, agree with me that if Congress were to impose upon the Secretary the duty, or give the Secretary the authority, to deprive the holders of the seven-thirties of their option to demand a certain description of bond that would be rank repudiation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Clearly.

Mr. CONKLING. Clearly; and the Senator will now see that I am not upon that branch of the subject, and am making no suggestion in reference to it. I am simply discussing within the limits of that domain which Congress or the Secretary could occupy without repudiation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend will pardon me, I misunderstood him. I understood him, in the outset of his remarks, to charge a degree of guilt on the Secretary of the Treasury in not having done something of this kind, and my inquiry was directed to the question (for I agree with him as to the law) whether the Secretary could do this until he had retired the seven-thirties which he was bound to take up with the five-twenty bonds.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator obviously did not attend to my remarks, nor did he allow me to come to the concluding part of them, which will be presently, else he could not have misconceived me so far. I trust I am as sensitive as other Senators upon the point of repudiation; and of course I comprehend that when the holder of a Government security has an option to demand a bond of a certain kind, that bond he is to receive; and I cannot understand how the Senator supposed that I was drawing any such question into the controversy.

The financial statement which lies upon our tables will enable the Senator to see that there is an indebtedness matured and not presented for payment amounting to nine millions and something. The Senator before me [Mr. WILLIAMS] has the statement showing precise figures; it is nine millions and something. In addition to this, there are three per cents., and in addition to them, compound-interest notes, as to neither of which exists the option or obligation to which the honorable Senator refers. I am speaking of bonds issued to redeem these, or sold for money to pay these and other like obligations, if any other exist. I make the discussion therefore just as broad as the limits which can be addressed to the honest discretion of Congress; and I proceed to inquire whether it is for lack of legislation, or for lack of anything that Congress can honestly do, that where the Secretary is at liberty to negotiate, he does it by issuing six per cent. coin-bearing bonds in place of more economical securities. I had called attention to the fact that the option was given him as to the form of the security, and touching the medium in which it was payable, both interest and principal:

"And any Treasury notes or other obligations bearing interest, issued under any act of Congress, may, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and with the consent of the holder, be converted into any description of bonds authorized by this act; and no bonds so authorized shall be considered a part of the amount of $600,000,000 hereinbefore authorized."

The Senate will see, without my dwelling upon it, the efficacy of this provision. I come next to the fact that by this act the Secretary is not confined in his negotiations to the American market, but may effect his transactions—

"In the United States or elsewhere, in such manner, and at such rates, and under such conditions as he may think advisable."

I think that is elastic, as much so as any legislator could make it.

Mr. President, if this act, with all these provisions, remains in being, I think I hazard nothing in asserting that it covers all the ground which can be covered by legislation conferring such powers on the Secretary. Let me turn now to the act of April 12, 1866, and see whether the provisions I have read are in being or not. I ask the attention of Senators to its language:

"That the act entitled 'An act to provide ways and means to support the Government,' approved March 3, 1865"—

That is the act, a part of which I have just read—

"shall be extended and construed to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, at his discretion, to receive any Treasury notes or other obligations issued under any act of Congress, whether bearing interest or not, in exchange for any description of bonds authorized by the act to which this is an amendment; and also to dispose of any description of bonds authorized by said act, either in the United States or elsewhere, to such an amount, in such manner, and at such rates as he may think advisable, for lawful money of the United States, or for any Treasury notes, certificates of indebtedness, or certificates of deposit, or other representatives of value, which have been or which may be issued under any act of Congress."

Bear in mind he may sell them for any representative of value, coin, lawful money, or any other known circulating medium recognized by the laws of the United States, and the proceeds, the avails, are to be used in retiring the debt. Thus, by a plain process, involving no circumlocution, the markets of the world are open to him. He may go with just such coin-bearing securities as he sees fit to issue, with interest not exceeding six per cent., nor running for more than forty years, and negotiate at the lowest rate of interest, and so far as the plighted faith of the Government does not stand in the way, do the very thing of which we talk so much, namely, fund the national debt at lower rates of interest.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to ask the Senator a question. As I understand, he accepts the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, as modified.

Mr. CONKLING. No, sir; I beg your pardon.

Mr. MORTON. I so understood the Senator.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg pardon of my honorable friend; he misunderstood me. I only remarked that the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, as modified, was an inflation to the amount of five millions, and would work a substitution of national bank currency for "greenbacks" to the amount which is specified in the amendment.

I wish to make another observation on the general question. If it be true that six per cent. coin-bearing bonds are the best securities for the Government which can be negotiated now, nothing that Congress can do, without repudiation, or, indeed, with repudiation, would cure the evil of high interest, because the laws of trade, I think, would prove superior to the laws of Congress. Therefore, in order to suppose that there could be utility in legislation in the direction of funding the public debt at lower rates, you must assume that the Government could do better than to pay six per cent. in coin, or eight per cent. in currency, which it amounts to, and still more when you take into account exemption from taxation.

Taking, then, this hypothesis as the only one which utilizes the question at all, I submit that it is too clear to be questioned that the existing statute makes the Secretary of the Treasury absolute master of the position. If there be anything in the direction of such power which is not clear upon the face of these acts, I am unable to imagine it. While I have no wish to preach a crusade against the Secretary of the Treasury, or to attack him, or act as his keeper, I feel unwilling, as the humblest member of this body, that the assertion should go unchallenged, that upon us rests the responsibility of withholding legislation by the aid of which the Government would be able to cease paying eight per cent. interest in currency or six per cent. in coin, and fund the debt at three, or three sixty-five, or four per cent., as the case may be. It is only to absolve myself, and, as far as I am permitted to speak for others, to absolve them from responsibility, that I have called attention to existing statutes. From these statutes all may see whether it be true that but for the default of Congress we should borrow money more cheaply, or put out securities bearing a lower rate of interest.

Here I leave the subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from New York has gone outside of the merits of the proposition before us, and, as I stated before, it is my desire to keep the discussion as far as possible to the particular proposition before the Senate. I shall only make a few remarks in reply to him, and not follow him into a very dangerous and dubious field of discussion. There is a great deal of feeling in the country as to the responsibility for a fact which I think is discreditable to the United States. While money can be borrowed by any private individual citizen on good securities for three or four per cent. we are now paying eight and forty hundredths per cent. for money. The United States, the most powerful Republic in the world, is paying more for money than any other nation of the first rank. I think it is time that this should cease. The responsibility for that fact is not for me to determine. One thing I can safely affirm, that I am not responsible for delay in acting upon this subject, for I have over and over again attempted to secure the action of the Senate upon measures tending to reduce the rate of interest on the public debt, but I bow to the manifest will of the Senate not to take up this question at this session. Therefore I will not discuss it.

I ought, however, to say, in justice to the Secretary of the Treasury, for I am not here as his defender, that the Secretary would naturally hesitate about assuming a responsibility which Congress have not been willing to take. The Senator from New York is correct in his construction of the law. I have carefully studied the loan laws, and I believe that the Secretary of the Treasury has the power under existing law, especially under the act of April 12, 1866, to issue any class of bonds authorized during the war. I am sorry indeed that such a power was conferred upon him. It never was done with my consent. Congress ought to prescribe the mode and manner and form, and the limitations of every loan that is made; especially since the uncertainty of war is over. We might prescribe many provisions that would aid him very much to fund the public debt and reduce its burdens. For neglecting to do this, Congress is responsible. It is a very doubtful thing whether he ought to assume to exercise the power of issuing a new class of bonds after the subject has been so much discussed and has not been acted upon in Congress. He can now issue, and I think, negotiate at par, a five per cent. bond, principal and interest payable in coin, redeemable in ten, twenty, or thirty years, and perhaps sell it at a premium. Certainly he should never issue a six per cent. bond while the state of the money market enables him to borrow money at a cheaper rate. But he might very well hesitate in assuming to issue a new class of bonds when Congress hesitates and doubts in regard to the terms.

Mr. CONKLING. If the honorable Senator will allow me, I do not understand the remark which he makes and repeats. He says the Secretary might be excused from this when we ourselves refuse to take the responsibility. I beg to inquire of the honorable Senator how he can say that, if it be true that we have taken the responsibility of conferring upon the Secretary expressly this power most amply and fully? The Senator agrees with me in thinking that we have. How, then, can he say that we do not take or have not taken the responsibility? Surely we cannot take the responsibility of administering the Department, or determining how much on a certain day it is possible for him to do in the way of changing the rate of interest; but everything else, it seems to me, we have done.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Secretary has the undoubted power to issue any kind of specie-bearing bond bearing an interest not exceeding six per cent., and any currency bond bearing interest not exceeding seven and three tenths per cent; but the Secretary would have to decide many questions before he could issue any bond whatever. Shall the interest be six per cent.? Shall it be five per cent.? Shall it be four and a half per cent.? Shall it be four per cent.? Shall it be three per cent.? We refuse to decide that question. He would have to decide it before issuing a single bond. Shall the principal of the bond be paid in gold and the interest be paid in gold? Shall the bonds be taxable, and to what extent? We will not decide these questions, and you cannot get a decision of any of these questions in this Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. We have decided it in this statute.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; you have said to him in that statute, "You may issue any kind of bond; you may take the responsibility; but we are all at sea about what kind of a bond you ought to issue; but if you do not issue such a kind of bond as we think you ought, we will attack you." That is the position in which that statute places the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not think so.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is. Now, Mr. President, there are many other points—

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senator from Ohio ought to add one other thing in justification of the Secretary of the Treasury, and that is, that nobody gets bonds paying six per cent. interest in gold without paying more than one hundred cents on the dollar for them.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ought to say also that the body of the bonds—I think nearly all the six per cent. bonds—that are now being issued are issued in pursuance of the plain provisions of the law in regard to seven-thirty notes. I cannot say now whether any have been issued beyond the amount used in the redemption of the seven-thirties.

Mr. EDMUNDS and Mr. WILSON. Not a cent.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am glad to hear that, because, I should think it almost a crime for the Secretary of the Treasury now to issue a six per cent. bond to pay a currency obligation.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. If that be so, if no bonds are issued except for the purpose of fulfilling this option given to the holders of the seven-thirties, how could any legislation of ours aid the matter?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will answer that. The Secretary of the Treasury has been able to redeem the floating indebtedness, together with the compound-interest notes, mainly by surplus revenue. That resource is exhausted by the reduction of taxes, and he will undoubtedly have to issue new bonds for the debts now maturing. He will be obliged to take the responsibility of determining the direct question which you yourselves hesitate about; and that is, what kind of bonds shall be issued? How much interest shall be paid, &c.? It is manifest now from the state of the money market that the United States could go into the markets of the world with a twenty or thirty years' five per cent. bond and redeem the present matured six per cent. five-twenties. It is probable that a five per cent. bond payable twenty years after date would sell at a higher rate in gold than our five-twenties now do. That is the opinion of many eminent financiers, and I think it is correct. Over five hundred million dollars of the present five-twenties are payable at any moment at our pleasure. The only question is whether they are payable in paper or in gold. Pending that question, which we neglect to decide, pending that doubt, bonds running the long period of twenty or thirty years at a lower rate of interest would induce thousands of people, not only in this country, but in Europe, to take new five per cent. bonds in exchange for their six per cents. There are now many trustees all over this country, in every State of the Union who desire a five per cent. bond in exchange for those now payable. If the Senator will only think of the number of companies that are based upon trust estates, and who would gladly accept a long bond, running ten, twenty, or thirty years, in exchange for the bond that is now payable, he will see that the demand in this country alone will absorb a large number of these bonds.

Mr. CONKLING. Then why are not the bonds issued for the purpose?

Mr. SHERMAN. Simply because, I suppose, the Secretary does not want to decide the very question which Congress has refused to decide; that is, the character of that bond and what interest it ought to bear. But I will not debate that question.

Mr. POMEROY. There is nothing in this bill about bonds.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is true, and I ought not probably to have gone so far into the debate on that subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator will allow me, I will suggest what is the probable answer; and that is, we have gone upon a regular system of keeping these loans within our control at short periods. We have issued two kinds of bonds, five-twenties and ten-forties. The idea has been to have them controllable, to keep them so that within a very short period of time comparatively we could, if the finances of the Government would permit, take them up. The suggestion which is made by the Senator of issuing bonds at thirty years, or twenty-five years positively, involves the idea of losing that controllability which has been a part of our system; and I suppose what the Secretary is waiting for is to see whether Congress is ready to give up that idea upon which we predicated our financial system heretofore in order to bring about a reduction of the interest. You may issue a five per cent. bond and reduce the rate of interest of course one per cent. and replace the six per cent. bonds now out with that five per cent. bond; but in so doing you decide that you will give up the power of redemption for a certain long period of time, which power you now have.

The first Secretary of the Treasury under the administration of Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Chase, adopted the system which I speak of. I thought it was a good system. I have been waiting for the time to come, and I have believed it would come, when the matter would be all in our own hands, when we might not be obliged to issue a bond even at five per cent., when we might fund a portion of our debt at least, if not the whole of it, at a still lower rate. So long as we hold the control, as we have it now, that is in our power; but if we replace our present bonds, which are within our control, with bonds at a less rate of interest running for thirty years, we lose it, and consequently we cannot look to a lower rate still. The question for Congress to decide is what it is best to do with reference to that particular matter; and it is that question, I take it, which the Secretary of the Treasury prefers that Congress should decide, whether it will abandon the old system upon which we stood in the beginning or whether we will adhere to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me say this further, in justice to the Secretary of the Treasury: it is his opinion undoubtedly, from his public messages, that a bond, say running twenty or thirty years, ought to be issued. It is the opinion of the Senator from Maine, and my own opinion corresponds with his, that we ought not to issue a bond, the principal of which is beyond the powers of redemption beyond ten years. The very first question that the Secretary will have to determine, if he issues new bonds, will be, what shall be the duration of those bonds? He will make them long bonds. He has so stated in his official reports. Now, I do not think that such bonds ought to be issued, and I never would, in any event, issue a bond in the present state of the money market running more than ten years, because I have no doubt that at the end of ten years we can reduce the rate of interest below five per cent. Now, we cannot get money for less than five per cent. But we have failed to legislate on that subject. We have left the matter open; and the Secretary will be compelled, from the pressure of public necessities, to act on his own judgment, on the general laws to which the Senator from New York referred, which are ample, and he will decide this question according to his judgment instead of according to the judgment of Congress. But, sir, I trust we shall not be led any further into this discussion.

The only question now before us, in my judgment, is whether we are willing to give to the southern and western States—nearly all to the southern—some little additional facilities in the way of banking until we can determine the great questions of currency that have been proposed here, and which will be discussed at the next session of Congress. My own judgment is, that public policy will require us to extend these banking facilities to the amount of $10,000,000 or $20,000,000. I shall be willing, in case $20,000,000 be thought by any Senator too much, to give them $10,000,000; so that in the leading cities of the South, in Mobile, Charleston, Atlanta, New Orleans, and other places, they may organize banks to aid in promoting the movement of the crops and the like. It ought to be done now. That is the only question in this case, and I trust nothing else will be brought into the debate.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no disposition to make any remarks on this subject, especially upon those questions that are not contained in the bill. This bond question is a bottomless pit, that we can throw into forever, and I believe we shall never then be agreed in regard to it. But the question of allowing our national banks that have been organized and have got no currency to have some currency, is a question of very great interest to those sections of the country from which the currency has been withheld. I suppose it is known to Senators that in the State that I in part represent, we organized national banks without any currency. We had to waive the question; because when we got ready to organize, there was no currency to be given out. Under that clause of the law allowing the banks in the East the right to convert their capital into national banks and take precedence of other organizations, they took up the amount limited in the law.

The apportionment of this currency was made upon the census of 1860. By that census we had a population in Kansas of one hundred and nine thousand, whereas to-day we have a population of three hundred and ninety or four hundred thousand. Even upon the basis of that apportionment, the population of 1860, when we had but one hundred and nine thousand inhabitants, we were entitled to $750,000, and yet we received only $350,000 circulation, or just about one half the circulation we were entitled to even under an apportionment based upon the population of 1860. But as our population increased the people of our State organized banks, and they waived the question of having circulation. They had the capital to make national banks, and they wanted banks of that character. Although they got no circulation from the Government, yet in some instances they were enabled to buy circulation. They went to New York and found where there was a surplus of circulation, some banks retiring which had more than they needed, other banks failing, and by some circumlocution, I never knew how it was, by paying three or four per cent., they were able to get circulation. They bought it of those who had it to spare and were willing to retire it, and by concert of action with the Comptroller they were able in some instances and by some means to obtain it.

Mr. JOHNSON. How much have you altogether?

Mr. POMEROY. We have $350,000 received from the Government, and then the banks have bought fifty or seventy thousand dollars from other parties; so that in the State there may possibly be $400,000 of bank circulation. Now, I say there is great complaint on this head. I only speak of my own State because it represents a class of States around on the borders that are growing, that are prosperous, but have no circulation comparatively. This bill in its last section is looking a little in the direction of giving relief. It is not anything like the remedy that I think ought to be applied. The Senator from Ohio begins to hint that if Senators think $20,000,000 too much, he will cut it down to $10,000,000. I had not supposed, if there was to be any change that it was to be in that direction. If there is to be any amendment to this $20,000,000 clause reported from the committee, do not let it be downward toward $10,000,000, but let it be upward toward the wants of the country.

There are those who think we might dispense with all national banks and issue greenbacks; but even if that was done the remote States on the border would not get any of the greenbacks. In order to have circulation distributed over the country to any great extent, to anything like an equal amount, there must be organizations in the locality that can control the currency, or otherwise the great money centers and markets of the country get it. It is an inevitable law of trade and commerce over which we have little or no control. It may be true that we might dispense with our national currency; those national banks might have issued to them greenbacks instead of national currency, and make them responsible; it would be better to have all one kind of currency in that respect; but there must be organizations in the different localities to control it, or else we lose control of the currency entirely, and it follows our products to market and goes where our products go.

I do not wish to see the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts adopted. I fear we are not prepared to adopt a system which we must ultimately reach, because the western and southern States are not going to be kept without circulation if we continue the system of having national banks; but I hope there will be at least no diminution of the $20,000,000 contained in the last section of the bill. This measure may do for this session. It is only a temporary measure if we are looking to the wants of the country. Before long, before we adjourn, there will be Senators here who will demand circulation and banks from six or seven States not represented here now. While this measure is before the Senate why can we not make some provision for those States? I propose when they are returned here to treat them not only as our equals, but in the most liberal and friendly manner. No one can shut his eyes to the wants that have already come to us from those sections of the country.

There is a restlessness, an uneasiness, and I think I may go as far as to say that there is a complaint in my own State and in other western States on account of the unequal distribution of circulation. They cannot see why it is that the eastern States, New York, and Pennsylvania, should have so much of the circulation of the country, and when they organize banks under the law in the West they are not able to get a dollar. I receive letters almost every day from my State inquiring why it was that I was sitting here and allowing such an unequal distribution of what was contained in the law. The Senator from Ohio has explained it; everybody can explain it; but our legislation ought to be of such a character that it does not need explanation. It ought to bear on its face such perfect equality among the citizens of the States and among the States that we should not have to explain to our constituents why it was that we lost our circulation and why we did not get our proportion.

I have thought that law was a most remarkable one. That law got into the tax bill. I confess I did not see it. That law that gave a preference to the old banks to convert their currency into national currency and have a preference over the new organizations found its way by some circumlocution or other into the tax bill where no one would expect it, and it became a law without my attention being called to it, I know. From that day to this, on the border, in the West, we have never had a national bank with national circulation, and we never shall have. We have applied to the Comptroller time and again. He tells us, what of course every one knew before he told it, that although his disposition is to give us circulation, he cannot do it under the law.

The last section in this bill reported by the Committee on Finance, affords a little relief. It is half a loaf, at any rate; and, if the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts should not prevail, as I hope it will, I certainly hope there will be no diminution of the $20,000,000 contained in this section. The Senate certainly should come up to that; and that will not satisfy the wants of the South at all. That will be taken up by banks already organized. If you notice the language of this section, they cannot organize another new bank under it. The language is, "which amount shall be issued only to banking associations organized." You cannot organize a new one.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, yes, you can.

Mr. POMEROY. I think the intention is to give it only to those banks that have organized and waived the question of circulation. If it means that new banks may be organized, I am glad of it; but I concluded that the construction was that it applied only to banks that are now organized.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no. It applies not only to banks now organized, but banks to be organized. If the Senator has any real doubt about it, it can be made certain; but there is no doubt about it. The section has been carefully prepared. The word "organized" applies not only to the past, but to the future.

Mr. POMEROY. A little amendment of course would make that perfectly clear. If it is intended that banks to be organized shall have it, it is all very well; but there are enough old banks organized to take up $4,000,000 of this amount. The Senator from Ohio, I suppose, has had his attention called to the fact that there are enough banks already organized that have waived their circulation to take $4,000,000 out of the $20,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. Those are only in three or four States, not in the South.

Mr. POMEROY. And they certainly should be first supplied. Then we may have $15,000,000 or $16,000,000 to organize new banks with. But, sir, to conclude, I will say that I am sure that anything less than the committee have reported will meet with most decided opposition in the country.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I think the reason why the States that have a disproportionate circulation came to have so much may be very readily explained. My friend from Kansas seems to overlook the fact that these States were compelled to take that circulation. They did not want to take it. We did not want to take it in my State. We had a bank circulation there; we had banks that satisfied us; but the Federal Government taxed our bank circulation out of existence, and told us to take this circulation or we should have none. Now we are told that that which was forced upon us against our will was a great favor, and we ought to make some compensation for it!

Mr. COLE. The same rule was applied to the banks in the West, in those States where banks were scarce, where the whole banking capital was swept away. They were taxed out of existence, also, but they are not now supplied with circulation.

Mr. ANTHONY. But if they were taxed out of existence, they had the opportunity at the same time to take the national circulation, to organize themselves as national banks.

Mr. COLE. But they cannot get the currency, because it cannot be furnished by the Comptroller.

Mr. CORBETT. The proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts to issue to the West $100,000,000 in bank currency, in my opinion, is a very generous one. It adds that much really to the West. It is true those banks would have to provide themselves with means to redeem that currency, but it retires that much of the legal tenders that are now circulated mainly in the cities of the East, and sends $100,000,000 of bank capital to the western and southern states. I think that is a wise provision, and we are approaching the time when something of the kind should be adopted. It places the Government in a position where it can more easily return to specie payments, so far as its own legal tenders are concerned. The Government and the banks must each prepare for a redemption of the notes eventually in specie. If this proposition be adopted there will then be about $400,000,000 of bank capital, and upon that they have to retain twenty per cent. That will be $80,000,000 of legal tenders that they will have to provide themselves with to redeem their currency. There will be, after the withdrawal of that $80,000,000, $170,000,000 of legal tenders in circulation. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, in my opinion, is a very wise one; but if that cannot be adopted, then I trust the amendment of my friend from Vermont will be adopted.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I do not desire to argue this question; I do not feel that I am not qualified to do it; but there are two or three very plain things about it. If the amendment of the Senator from Vermont is adopted, if we increase the bank circulation $20,000,000 we then withdraw the legal-tender circulation to the same amount, and as there is not money in the Treasury to spare for that purpose, it has got to be done by selling bonds; in other words, we add $20,000,000 to the bonded debt and $1,200,000 to the interest every year by that operation. If we adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, we increase the bank circulation $100,000,000, and we withdraw the legal-tender notes to that amount. We increase the bonded indebtedness $100,000,000 thereby.

Mr. CORBETT. Do we not pay the interest on the debt now, the same as we should do then? We do not issue any new bonds. The bonds are in the market, and these banking institutions will go into the market and purchase the bonds.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I am not mistaken. If we issue $100,000,000 of bank currency more than we have, the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts is that we shall take up $100,000,000 of United States notes to avoid inflating the currency. How shall we take them up? We have not got those notes in the Treasury collected from taxes to spare. That would make a deficit in the Treasury. Therefore we must get these legal-tender notes by selling bonds to that amount. We would add to our bonded debt $100,000,000, which would increase the annual interest $6,000,000, unquestionably.

Mr. President, we are certainly not prepared at this time to adopt the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, to increase the bonded debt $100,000,000, and the amount of interest paid $6,000,000. If we had the money in the Treasury to take up and cancel these legal-tender notes without selling bonds, if these notes were in the Treasury derived from taxes, and we had the amount to spare, we could just cancel them; but as we have not got the money in the Treasury to spare for that purpose, we must get these legal tenders by selling bonds, just as was done by the Secretary of the Treasury before we stopped the contraction by our late act. That was the way he was there contracting. He was contracting the currency, not by canceling so many legal-tender notes that might be found in the Treasury received from taxes or revenue, but his cancellation took place entirely by selling bonds to that amount, and converting a debt that did not bear interest into a debt that does bear interest. That was the way he contracted the currency, as everybody knows.

Mr. CORBETT. I think the Senator is entirely mistaken about the issue of any additional bonds. There is nothing in the provision, according to the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, to increase our debt by issuing new bonds.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to ask my friend one question. That proposition includes the cancellation of $100,000,000 of greenbacks. Now, how is the Government going to get the $100,000,000 to cancel them?

Mr. CORBETT. They issue that amount of bank currency to the country, which is based upon the bonds of the United States, which the banks purchase in the market, and retain just that amount more bonds in the country than would otherwise flow to Europe.

Mr. MORTON. The bank currency does not belong to the Government. That goes to the banks upon condition that they deposit bonds to that amount with ten per cent. as a margin. Now, the question of canceling the legal-tender notes is a different proposition entirely, and is done to prevent the inflation of the currency. But to cancel them we must get them; and we can only get them in two ways: either by taxation or by selling bonds of that amount. We cannot bear the taxation now. Therefore we must get them as the Secretary of the Treasury got them before, by selling bonds to that amount, and thus add $6,000,000 to the interest of the public debt every year. We cannot stand that.

Now, Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Ohio that, in my estimation, his proposition amounts, after all, substantially to the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, leaving off the question of inflating the currency. If you begin to issue bank currency for the purpose of equalizing the circulation, you cannot stop at $20,000,000. It will take at least $100,000,000 to equalize the currency among the several States.

Mr. HOWE. That will not do it.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Wisconsin says that will not do it; I say it will take at least $100,000,000 to do it; and whenever you begin to equalize the currency you will not stop until you have done it. Therefore I say the proposition of the Senator from Ohio amounts substantially to that of the Senator from Massachusetts, with this difference: that the Senator from Ohio would begin now with $20,000,000 and he would then go up to $100,000,000 or $125,000,000, or whatever may be necessary for that purpose, while the Senator from Massachusetts begins with $100,000,000 at first. That is the principal difference.

I know that the distribution of our bank circulation is unequal; it is a hardship; but I think it is rather too late in the session now to begin upon that question, and I would rather have it deferred until some general system can be adopted. We do not know yet what course we are going to take with these questions; and it seems to me that the whole question ought to be considered together, because it is connected in every part.

Mr. CORBETT. It is said that we shall have a surplus in the Treasury over and above the expenditures from the taxes this year. I think it quite probable that such will be the case. According to the argument of the Senator from Indiana, we have got to have a surplus, and there should be a provision in the bill directing the Secretary to redeem the circulation at such times as he should have a surplus of money to do it with; and there ought to be, perhaps, in the amendment of the Senator from Vermont the same provision. I have no doubt in my mind from the present exhibit of the Treasury that there will probably be a surplus this year, and I think that provision should be made.

I hardly think the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will be carried; but it suits me better than the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. If, however, the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts should not be adopted I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, because it was understood when we stopped the contraction of the currency that we should not go into inflation, and it was especially so stated here by the chairman of the Committee on Finance that he had no idea of taking any steps in the direction of inflation. I charged at the time that that measure to stop the contraction of the currency was but the entering wedge; that the next step would be to inflate the currency. The Senator from Ohio then stated that it was not the idea of the Finance Committee to inflate the currency at all. This is a direct proposition to inflate the currency $20,000,000, and unless the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont is adopted, it certainly does inaugurate a system of inflation which will create great dissatisfaction in financial circles where there is plenty of money now, and who will take advantage of that inflation to increase the prices of everything, and the West will not get any of the additional money.

Mr. FERRY. I am opposed to the amendment proposed by the committee as the fifth section as it stands, mainly for the reasons which have been already given, believing that the adoption of that amendment would be a step in a downward progress. I am also opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, and that submitted by the Senator from Vermont, because their tendency is toward entering upon the consideration of a question which we have neither inclination nor time nor surrounding circumstances to dispose of at the present session. I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, and shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, believing that by attaching the latter amendment to the section as it stands I shall more certainly be enabled to secure the defeat of the section itself.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. In order to simplify the business before the Senate, I withdraw my amendment so that we may have a vote directly upon the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts first. If that shall not be adopted, I will then offer the amendment which I have proposed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to say one word in reply to what was said by the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] as to the effect of this action. I do not see that there is any avoiding the inference he draws, that if you make it imperative that a like amount of the greenbacks so-called, the United States notes, shall be retired, they must be retired by issuing bonds for that purpose, unless you have a surplus in the Treasury with which you can take them up. We have been cutting down taxes in all directions, and still intend to cut down taxes according to the legislation which is proposed, so that it is not likely we shall have any surplus, but we shall have a deficiency. That matter ought to be considered.

The question comes back to this simply, whether you are going to lose enough on the interest that you would pay for an additional amount of bonds to make it unwise to do it with a view to the resumption of specie payments some time or other. The better way undoubtedly would be, and the sensible way, if we ever intend to resume specie payment at all, to have a surplus in our Treasury every year which can be devoted to that purpose. But if we intend to lighten taxation so that we cannot have a surplus in the Treasury with which to redeem our notes, and go on in that way, and at the same time refuse to issue any kind of securities in the place of them, because they pay no interest and the securities to be issued would pay interest, then it amounts to nothing but an indefinite postponement of the resumption of specie payments. Then the question for Congress to consider is whether that is not enough of an object, at some time or other, to compensate for the additional interest that we might pay, if we shall not have a surplus, if we will not resort to taxation to get means to do it. That is a question for Congress to consider, on which I at present give no opinion, for the matter is not before us.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senator will allow me to suggest to him that there is no probability of our expenditures so far exceeding our receipts that we shall not have a reserve in specie in the Treasury by which these notes could be paid.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is not a question of how much specie we have; it is a question simply of how much we have over and above what is necessary for the expenditures of the Government. Anything that we want over that we must borrow, no matter in what shape it is put, and we must pay interest on it; so that after all it comes back to the same question, whether or not we lose or gain by issuing paper in some shape or other on which we pay interest, provided we are making progress toward a resumption of specie payments. I have always held, and I was in hopes Congress would stick to that policy, though I have not been particularly gratified at this session by the movements in that direction—I have thought that Congress should adhere to the idea which it proclaimed a few years ago, of a gradual reduction of United States notes, that we might get back to a point where everybody would redeem in specie in order to accomplish all the good that is to be gained by a redemption in specie of all obligations.

I think, without attempting to elaborate it, that we should save vastly more, year by year, to the country if we could once get back to that state of things than we should be likely to lose by any amount of interest we might pay upon bonds issued to enable us to accomplish it. But the better way still would be not to reduce our taxation so low that we are obliged to resort to anything of that description. The idea was awhile ago—and it was the true one in my judgment, financially—that we should have every year a surplus in the Treasury, to be raised by taxation, (the only proper way,) and that we should apply that surplus to a limited extent and to a reasonable extent, and every year and every month as we went along, fixing it as reasonably as we could toward the accomplishment of that purpose, which is the great purpose, in my judgment, without which we shall never have any sound financial operations in this country. Agreeing with my friends that, in the present state of things, or the prospective state of things, we may be obliged, if we pass this, to resort to borrowing precisely in the same way, yet I am not satisfied that even if we did to the amount of $20,000,000, provided we improved the system and adhered to it, we should be the losers in the end.

Mr. CORBETT. I should like to know whether, if we even should increase the debt $100,000,000, and we should pay five per cent., $5,000,000, on that, it would not be better to pay that and save a much larger amount to the country now lost on the bonds exported? By bringing down the amount of legal tenders, as proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, to $250,000,000, we should be in a condition to return to specie payments at once, or within a very short time. Would it not be better to pay the interest on $100,000,000 at five per cent., being $5,000,000, and save $33,000,000 on the export of $100,000,000 of bonds which we now send out of the country, and which we shall have to redeem hereafter dollar for dollar to foreign holders. While, under the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, we pay $5,000,000 more of interest we shall gain $30,000,000 on the export of bonds, provided we export $100,000,000 of bonds next year.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to ask the Senator one question upon that point. Suppose that we substitute bank notes for greenbacks, how much nearer are we to specie payments than we were before? If we substitute $100,000,000 of bank notes for $100,000,000 of greenbacks, what do we gain? The Government is liable for the bank notes as much as it is for the legal-tender notes. The bank notes are worth seventy cents on the dollar and the legal-tender notes are worth the same, and no less when taken up. How do you approach specie payments in that way, by putting out other paper redeemable only in paper?

Mr. CORBETT. I will tell you exactly how. If a bank is not able to redeem its notes in legal-tender notes or specie, it must go into liquidation, and you have its bonds to throw on the market, and you will get from those bonds in the foreign market $100,000,000, where you are now getting only $72,000,000, thus saving $28,000,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILSON. I ask that the question be divided. There are two sections in my amendment, and I wish the question taken on each one by itself.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope the Senator will withdraw the last section, and let us vote on the first section of his amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I ask to have the question divided, so that we may vote on the first, and then I shall ask for the yeas and nays on the last section.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I simply rise to say that I do not wish the vote I am about to give to be construed into an expression of opinion on the questions involved in this proposition. I regret very much that the Senator from Massachusetts should have introduced at this time this proposition, when he knows very well that both Houses of Congress are greatly divided upon the question as between greenbacks and national bank notes. Much discussion has taken place in Congress upon that subject, and it has been impossible to reach any conclusion; and it seems to me that it is wise at this time to avoid any conclusion upon that subject until we can have more time in which to consider the great financial problem that is before us. If this proposition that the Senator from Massachusetts has made is adopted, it will be understood and construed by the country that Congress has taken ground in favor of the annihilation of the greenback currency and the substitution for it of national bank currency. That may be a correct ground to occupy; but so far as I am concerned I prefer not to decide that question until we can have more time to consider and discuss the subject; and the Senator knows very well, if I may be allowed to use the expression here, that our political friends are greatly divided on this question; but perhaps that is not a matter that is entitled to any consideration.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for a division of the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on striking out the words proposed and inserting the first section of the proposed amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question, recurs on the second clause of the amendment.

Mr. WILSON. On the second clause I want the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to the Senator that as that is an amendment in the nature of a new section, it will come in better after the amendment of the committee is acted on, unless he moves to strike out the fifth section and insert this. Let us vote first on the fifth section, and then his amendment can be offered as a new section.

Mr. WILSON. Very well; I waive it at present; I will offer it afterward.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I now move the amendment I proposed before, to come in at the end of the section reported by the committee, and I merely call the attention of the Senate to it to see whether we are willing to stand by anything:

And upon the issue of any increased national circulation provided for in this section, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to permanently withdraw an equal amount of United States notes.

Mr. HOWE. I want to say simply that I shall vote against that amendment and I shall vote against this section; but if I knew the section would be adopted I think I should still vote against the amendment. As I understand the amendment, it simply requires the Secretary of the Treasury to take out of his vaults $1,000 which he has received from taxes, and destroy them whenever any number of citizens shall issue $1,000 in notes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They are not dollars.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from Vermont says that they are not dollars. Well, sir, your law says they are dollars, and the tax-payers who put them in the Treasury say they have cost them dollars. I know that at the same time you cancel an obligation of the Government that the Government would have to meet in future years, but you have deranged the tax-paying capacities of the country just to the extent that you destroy this currency. I do not believe that is a fair or a legitimate way of reducing circulation or of retiring the Treasury notes. I think there is a legitimate way of doing that, and I hope to see that way adopted some time or other.

I was utterly opposed to the legislation under which the Secretary was authorized to burn up four millions of money a month formerly, and I am utterly opposed to giving him authority to destroy any kind of property that he takes out of the pockets of the people for taxes. The only excuse you have for taxing a man is that you want the money to disburse, to meet the Government expenditures. You have no right to tax him in order to get means to destroy, I take it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I do not know of anybody that has really shown such an exhibition of hostility against any parties destroying their own notes except an Irish mob that once broke into a private banker's establishment in Great Britain, and they thought they were doing him immense harm by burning up his own printed notes. It seems, according to the Senator from Wisconsin, to be an immense harm to the Government of the United States to destroy their promises to pay! I certainly do not comprehend it. I think this is a question merely of expansion and I propose to introduce an amendment so that we shall neither expand nor contract, so that there shall be an equal amount of circulation afloat after the passage of this bill that there was before it. That is all there is to it.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, the Irishman and I would have reasoned precisely alike if it had happened that the house that was broken open was controlled by a man situated precisely as the Government of the United States is. If the notes had been the only means the man had to live on, I think the Irishman would have been entirely right in refusing to destroy them and entirely right in concluding that they would do the owner of the house a great injury in burning them up. These notes are just what the Government has got to live on for this year, and you raised these notes for that very purpose. That is the difference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If I knew how to accomplish it I should vote either for or against the amendment of the Senator from Vermont in such a way as to defeat this fifth section. I deeply regret that a proposition should be brought into the Senate by the Finance Committee to commence the work of expansion, to borrow $20,000,000 in time of peace. I think it a humiliating spectacle to this nation that we should propose now to borrow $20,000,000. That is exactly what this is. I had hoped that we were gradually, as time passed on, approaching the period when we should again have specie payments, when the business of the country would be done upon a specie basis; but it seems we are to depart from that, and to commence borrowing, $20,000,000 at a clip here, and the Senator from Massachusetts proposes, I believe, to borrow $100,000,000.

Mr. DRAKE. Will the Senator from Illinois please explain how, if this section is adopted, we borrow $20,000,000?

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator will read it, he will see that it proposes to amend section twenty-two of the banking act so that the maximum limit of circulation fixed by that act shall be increased $20,000,000. That authorizes an additional issue of $20,000,000 for which the Government will be bound.

Mr. DRAKE. How bound?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Government will be responsible for the notes.

Mr. COLE. It seems to me the position taken by the Senator from Illinois is hardly tenable. I do not know how this can be considered as borrowing. The proposition is simply to authorize the issuing of $20,000,000 more of circulation, for which United States securities are to be placed in charge of the Comptroller. I do not regard it in any light as adding to the indebtedness of the United States. It cannot possibly be so construed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Whenever an individual or a Government puts out a circulation; or authorizes anybody else to put it out, for which it is bound, I regard that as borrowing so much money; it comes back to the Government to be paid. You propose to issue an additional currency here, and get further and further, as it seems to me, all the time from that specie basis to which it ought to be the desire of the country to return. I think the material interests and the prosperity of the country require us to get back to specie payments as soon as we can. I do not believe we are approaching it when we are expanding the currency.

Mr. DRAKE. I shall be very far from attempting to participate in a general discussion of the general aspects of our currency and finances; but there is one thing in regard to this matter which I know enough about to be able to say. I find that the opposition to this section, which is avowedly intended for the benefit of those States where there is very little circulation, comes from those portions of the country where they have all the circulation they need and plenty to spare; where they have fifty dollars of circulation for every inhabitant, and are not willing to give more than fifty cents of circulation to some of the other portions of the Union. The chairman of the Committee on Finance stated that fact, that there are some of the States south and west which have not twelve cents, I think he said, per capita circulation.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend will allow me, I will give him the figures. In the three States of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut they have $59,000,000, more than twice their proportion of circulation according to population. If an amendment were offered proposing to withdraw the $20,000,000 from the States having a great excess, I should feel disposed to vote for it, though I do not want to disturb those States.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the chairman of the Committee on Finance now state how the taxation per capita is in those States?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am not prepared to do that here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DRAKE. My State happens to be one of those so situated when the banking act went into effect that we could not command the bonds that could be commanded in other sections of the country in order to get banking circulation. Overrun with war, with our whole population profoundly afflicted and impoverished, we could not do as New England could, accumulate money and buy bonds and get national bank circulation. They were growing rich while we were growing poor. Now, sir, when we are beginning to gather up a little again from the adversity of that period and are in a position where we can get bonds and pledge them for national bank note circulation, New England and New York, gorged with all that they want, stand here to say that we shall not have any addition whatever to our national bank circulation.

Mr. President, I confess that I do not know much about finance; but I know enough to understand that kind of injustice, and to utter my protest against it here on the floor of the Senate. I know another thing about this matter: that there is now not a circulation of money in this country more than equal to about twelve dollars and some cents per capita of the population of the country; whereas, in 1860, there was a circulation per capita of fifteen dollars. I know another thing, too, that the business of the country was largely conducted then with notes and bills of exchange, requiring much less money than it requires now, when the business of the country is so largely a cash business. And yet, sir, we are to be kept down and down and down all the time by that region of country which is going about loaded down with the money that it made in the period of our affliction. Sir, I think I can see this, and I can see it strong enough to justify me in expressing my views in this manner in behalf of the region of country from which I come.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I am sorry to hear the remarks made by the Senator from Missouri. The Senator speaks of what he knows, and he tells us very positively that we have less money in circulation per capita than we had before the war. Sir, we have $650,000,000 of paper money in circulation now. We had $200,000,000 before the war, and the percentage is larger than it was before the war. So his knowledge is at fault on that point.

Mr. DRAKE. Perhaps not.

Mr. WILSON. Sir, the Senator's knowledge is at fault on another point. He tells us that we in New England made money in the war, so as to be able to establish banks. The fact is we in New England have no more banks now than we had when the war began. Several of our State banks refused to become national banks. The banking capital of Massachusetts has been increased but little, if any, and the same is true of the New England States. The Senator talks about our making money. Let me say that no part of the country made money in the war as did the agricultural States of the West. They increased their wealth and their population largely, they paid off mortgages, and they came out of the war stronger than ever before. New England made money in the war, but the percentage was not one third of what the profit of the Northwest was.

How comes it that in New England we have so large a proportion of the national bank capital? We had the banking capital before the war. In my State we had more than sixty million dollars of banking capital when the war began. On this capital we received one per cent. into the Treasury to support the State government. Congress asked us to change our State banks into national banks, and we promptly did it. Is there anything in this deserving reproach? Is there anything wrong in it? Is this patriotic action to be assailed here? The other States that chose to convert their State banks into national banks did so. The western States did so, and they established some new banks.

I wish we could come to a free-banking system at once. If we could reach specie payments I would be for it; but we cannot do it at present. Now, it is proposed by this committee to add to the national currency $20,000,000. I propose to have $100,000,000 of banking capital established in the new sections of the country and in the South, for the reason that what they want there is not circulation so much as capital. Establish banks there, and they will be managed by the business men of the locality who have a local feeling and interest, and they will invest the capital at home, invest it in their local business. Issue an equal amount of greenbacks, and they will float to the Atlantic sea-board, and this greenback is a talk in favor of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, and against all the agricultural portions of the country.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On the same principle, would not the bank notes come here?

Mr. WILSON. Not to the same extent, by any means. They generally contrive to keep a portion of the circulation at home. Of course the circulation will tend to the commercial points, but the capital will remain at home, and will be employed in the local business of the country. What they need in these new sections is active capital much more than circulation.

Sir, I regret to hear assaults made on any section of the country. There is an inequality in the banking system which ought to be remedied, and I am in favor of beginning now. I have, however, been voted down in my amendment, and now I will vote the $20,000,000. But, sir, the idea thrown out in the Senate about founding circulation on population is one of the most absurd ideas ever uttered by sensible men. There are portions of a State that need one hundred times the banking capital that other portions of the same State do. There are some States that need ten or twenty times as much banking capital and circulation as other States need for their business. Take a manufacturing, a commercial, a mechanical community, and it needs ten, twenty, or thirty times over the amount of banking capital and circulation that a purely agricultural population needs. Everybody knows that; and therefore the idea of equalizing the banking circulation of the country according to population is an absurd idea, and should be abandoned at once. Sir, there is, however, too much inequality now, and I will join with Senators at any time in trying to correct it.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, I have not assailed New England nor New England capital. I have only endeavored to repel an assault upon this measure which comes from that region and regions that are similarly situated to that with regard to the abundance of their means. The chairman of the Finance Committee stated that the specific object of this amendment was to enable certain regions of the country to obtain circulation which are now without it, or which have a very small amount of it; and, incidentally, the measure is assailed with opposition from that region which is overflowing with circulation. I do not assail them. They are assailing the country that I come from and the interests of the country that I come from. I am only repelling that assault.

Now, sir, I take issue of fact with the honorable Senator from Massachusetts upon the matter of money per capita in this country at this time as compared with 1860. I think the honorable Senator from Massachusetts referred only to the paper circulation of the country in 1860 per capita. I included the whole circulation, coin and paper, and in the then population of the country, I assert as a matter of fact, which I believe susceptible of proof and established by official data, that the circulation per capita was fifteen dollars, while now I believe it is capable of verification by the official facts that it is only twelve dollars and some cents; and the fact is that the period of 1860 was not a period of inflation in the currency of the country. Are we going to get into a period of inflation now, even if we were to take the circulation of the country up to the same ratio per capita that it was in 1860.

Mr. President, I say again, that I do not pretend to understand this whole subject, but I think I can see it plainly enough to understand that the interests of the people I represent in the great valley of the Mississippi are concerned in this matter, and deeply concerned in it—that people who are now paying annually millions of dollars perhaps of interest to the capitalists of the East for money borrowed from them, and for which the eastern capitalists hold mortgages upon their property. They want money and banking facilities to move their products. All that I ask is that they shall have some little share of what is going in the country in that way.

Mr. COLE. Mr. President—

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator will yield the floor, I will make a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have a vote on this section.

Mr. POMEROY. I understand that the Senator from California desires to address the Senate at some length on this question.

Mr. COLE. Not at any length.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have a vote on this question.

Mr. COLE. I am willing to waive what I have to say until we take the vote on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, if that be deemed desirable.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we had better vote on it.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senate is ready to vote I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I shall occupy the attention of the Senate for but a few minutes.

Mr. COLE. If there is to be further debate I would rather go on. I yielded the floor to allow a vote to be taken.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to ask unanimous consent to call up a bill with a view of offering some amendments to it for the purpose of having them printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield the floor?

Mr. DAVIS. I object to any motion of that kind by the honorable Senator from Nevada. He intervenes so many of his rapid and quick movements here that I have become suspicious of him. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEWART. I will state that it is a bill—

Mr. DAVIS. I object to the Senator making his statement.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I suppose the Senator from Kentucky will yield to that motion.

Mr. DAVIS. I do.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator from Kentucky yielding the floor, I move that Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

AMERICAN SHARPSHOOTERS' FESTIVAL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks unanimous consent to lay before the House the following invitation, which has the appearance of being national in its character:

THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE AMERICAN SHARPSHOOTERS' SOCIETY.
NEW YORK, June 9, 1868.

HON. SCHUYLER COLFAX,

Speaker of the House of Representatives:

Mr. SPEAKER: Under the auspices of the National Association of American Sharpshooters a great national festival will be held from June 27 to July 6, 1868, at Jones's Wood, New York city; the festivities to be opened on the 29th of June with a grand public demonstration and procession.

The object of the festival, the third of this kind ever held in America, is not only to bring together once more the societies and organizations of sharpshooters existing in the United States, and thereby promote the particular objects of the association, but also to foster and cultivate the unity and harmony of the different nationalities representing the power, civilization, and progress of the American Republic.

In compliance with a resolution of the above association, we beg leave to tender you and the members of the House this invitation, with the most respectful request to honor our festival with your presence.

With the highest respect, we remain, Mr. Speaker, your obedient servants.

For the National Association of American Sharpshooters: THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

P. F. STEFFEN,

President.

MAXIMILIAN MORGENTHAU, Secretary.

F. SIGEL.

GEORGE KUSTER.

CHARLES G. CORNELL,

Address: M. MORGENTHAU, Secretary, &c., No. 86

Fourth avenue, New York.

Mr. JUDD. I move that the invitation be accepted, and that the House be represented at the opening ceremony by a committee of seven of its members.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I hope not. It is a very bad practice to learn our people to shoot sharp. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPALDING. We want to send some of our sharpshooters.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman can do that, undoubtedly.

The motion of Mr. JUDD was agreed to.

Mr. CHANLER moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as the committee Messrs. JUDD, GARFIELD, PAINE, CHANLER, ORTH, ROBERTSON, and KNOTT.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that that body had passed the following bills, each with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 870) to remove disabilities from Roderick R. Butler, of Tennessee; and

A bill (H. R. No. 598) to continue the Bureau for the relief of Freedmen and Refugees, and for other purposes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. VAN AUKEN asked and obtained leave of absence for one week.

Mr. ALLISON asked and obtained leave of absence for two days.

DONATION OF IRON RAILINGS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution (H. R. No. 294) donating to the Washington City Orphan Asylum the iron railing taken from the old Hall of the House of Representatives. It has come from the Committee on Appropriations, and there will be no objection to it.

Mr. SPALDING. I would like to know if the Committee on Appropriations can appropriate iron fences. [Laughter.] I object to it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Let it be read.

Mr. SPALDING. If the gentleman will offer it on his own individual hook I will make no objection.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Well, I will offer it on my own hook.

The resolution was read. It donates the iron railings to the Washington City Orphan Asylum, provided that the same shall be taken away in ten days after the passage of this act.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I have received the following letter on this subject:

ARCHITECT'S OFFICE, CAPITOL EXTENSION,
WASHINGTON, D. C., June 12, 1868.

Sir: In reply to your verbal inquiries on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations relative to the iron railing recently taken from the old Hall of Representatives, I have the honor to state that the railing is not required for any purpose about the Capitol, nor do I know where it can be used to any advantage at any of the other public buildings.

An unnecessary heavy expense will be incurred by using this railing at the public grounds; the pattern being very expensive, so that the additional railing to match, which might have to be purchased, will make the fence cost much more than a more suitable one should. I therefore recommend that it be disposed of, by sale or otherwise, in order to get it away from the front of the Capitol.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
EDWARD CLARK, Architect.
Hon. E. B. WASHBURN, Acting Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

Mr. PRICE. How much is this fence worth?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The fence is lying out here near this building, and is an unsightly thing.

Mr. PRICE. I did not ask where it was, but what it cost.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have consulted with the architect of the Capitol, and he says, as his letter shows, that there is no earthly use for it.

Mr. PRICE. It can be sold, I suppose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have no interest in the matter whatever. If the gentleman objects, let it go.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa object?

Mr. PRICE. No, sir; I do not.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RELIEF FROM DISABILITY.

Mr. PAINE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1217) to relieve T. J. Mackey, of South Carolina, of disabilities; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

REPRESENTATION OF SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. BINGHAM. I report back from the Committee on Reconstruction the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1058) to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama to representation in Congress, with the recommendation that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in; and I call the previous question.

The amendments were read, as follows:

"Page 1, line two of the preamble, strike out and."

"Page 1, line two, after the word 'Alabama,' insert 'and Florida.'"

"Page 1, line eight, strike out the words 'in form.' Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Whereas the people of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida have, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and the acts supplementary thereto, framed constitutions of State government which are republican, and have adopted such constitutions by large majorities of the votes cast at the elections held for the ratification or rejection of the same: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That each of the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida shall be entitled and admitted to representation in Congress as a State of the Union when the Legislature of such State shall have duly ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and known as article fourteen, upon the following fundamental conditions: that the constitutions of neither of said States shall ever be amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the United States of the right to vote in said State who are entitled to vote by the constitution thereof herein recognized, except as a punishment for such crimes as are now felonies at common law, whereof they shall have been duly convicted, under laws equally applicable to all the inhabitants of said States: Provided, That any alteration of said constitutions may be made with regard to the time and place of residence of voters; and the State of Georgia shall only be entitled and admitted to representation upon this further fundamental condition: that the first and third subdivisions of section seventeen of the fifth article of the constitution of said State, except the proviso to the first subdivision, shall be null and void, and that the General Assembly of said State, by solemn public act, shall declare the assent of the State to the foregoing fundamental condition.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That if the day fixed for the first meeting of the Legislature of either of said States, by the constitution or ordinance thereof, shall have passed, or have so nearly arrived before the passage of this act, that there shall not be time for the Legislature to assemble at the period fixed, such Legislature shall convene at the end of twenty days from the time this act takes effect, unless the Governor-elect shall sooner convene the same.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the first section of this act shall take effect as to each State, except Georgia, when such State shall, by its Legislature, duly ratify article fourteen of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and as to the State of Georgia when it shall, in addition, give the assent of said State to the fundamental condition hereinbefore imposed upon the same; and thereupon the officers of each State, duly elected and qualified under the constitution thereof, shall be inaugurated without delay; but no person prohibited from holding office under the United States, or under any State by section three of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, known as article fourteen, shall be deemed eligible to any office in either of said States, unless relieved from disability as provided in said amendment. And it is hereby made the duty of the President, within ten days after receiving official information of the ratification of said amendment by the Legislature of either of said States, to issue a proclamation announcing that fact.

Amend the title by striking out the word "and," and inserting after the word "Alabama" the words "and Florida."

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Before my colleague on the committee insists on the previous question, I desire him to give way to me to move an amendment and submit some remarks in support of it.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will yield to my colleague, but I hope he will not take much time with his remarks. How long a time will you want?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Fifteen or twenty minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. Very well; I yield fifteen minutes to my colleague.

Mr. SPALDING. Before the gentleman from Illinois proceeds I want to move an amendment. I wish to move to concur in the amendments of the Senate with an amendment striking out Alabama.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have no right to yield for that purpose.

Mr. SPALDING. My colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] has promised to yield to me for this purpose.

The SPEAKER. He has now yielded to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to strike out all of this bill that relates to the admission of Representatives in Congress from Florida. And in support of my amendment I desire to say that I make it, as I think the House will believe from my past course in regard to reconstruction, because I am thoroughly convinced that Florida ought not to be readmitted to representation in Congress with its present constitution.

In the first place, the constitution of Florida was irregularly formed; I can but briefly go over the history of its formation. It seems that a majority of the delegates elected to the Florida convention assembled at the time appointed; they were sworn, organized the convention, elected its officers, and proceeded with the business of the convention for a week or so. In the meantime the minority of the convention, refusing to go into the convention, by constant efforts to withdraw members from the convention succeeded in getting enough to withdraw to leave the convention without a quorum.

The convention, however, assembled from day to day and proceeded, as far as it could without a quorum, in the details of a constitution, and finally adjourned for a week, in order that other members of the convention might come in and that they might submit what they had done to General Meade. Before the expiration of the week, and on Saturday night, I think it was, the minority, who had adjourned to some neighboring village, came in, in the night, broke into the hall, and took possession of it and held it. On the day when the convention was to reassemble they found this minority in possession of the hall, with bayonets at the door to keep them out.

This minority convention, finding that they had not a majority to proceed to business, proceeded first to expel four members of the convention, to vote them out and to vote in the minority candidates, who had no certificates of election, and who in some instances confessedly had but a most meager minority of the votes cast. Acting upon the principle that as they had voted out the men who were elected somebody ought to represent those districts, they voted in the men who were not elected.

Then they proceeded with the work of making a constitution. After they had completed their labors, in order to get the delegates of the convention to sign it they passed an ordinance providing that no member should receive his pay as delegate to that convention unless he signed the constitution. Many of the members of the convention were very poor men, many of them were colored men, depending entirely upon the pay they should receive as delegates in order to defray their expenses. Of course, they walked up and signed the constitution for the purpose of obtaining money to defray their expenses and pay their debts. By this means they succeeded in getting a majority of the delegates elected to the convention to sign the constitution.

Now, what is the constitution of Florida? It erects a little oligarchy down there in Florida; nothing else in the world. It gives to the Governor-elect of that State the power to appoint nearly all the State officers. And, by the way, the man elected Governor of Florida is one of the Postmaster General's mail agents in Florida. And the man elected Lieutenant Governor is, I believe, from the pineries of Wisconsin, where the Barston frands were got up; and I do not know but what he is another of the post office agents.

The Governor of Florida is authorized by this constitution to appoint all the other State officers, the attorney general, secretary of State, State treasurer, State auditor, superintendent of schools, and all such officers. These State officers are made a sort of staff to the Governor; they are his counsel, and are authorized by the constitution to advise him as to the constitutionality of any law, and as to the proper construction to be given to any provision of the State constitution. And the Governor, taking the advice of the creatures he himself appoints, may set aside any law passed by the Legislature of that State.

Not only that, the Governor of Florida is to appoint all the judges of the State—the supreme court judges and the circuit court judges. Not only that, but the salaries of these judges are fixed very high. They have more circuit judges in the little State of Florida than they had in the great State of Illinois when I first went there, with salaries of from three to four thousand dollars each, while in my State, at this time, judges get $1,000 salary with some petty fees. The supreme judges of Florida are to get $4,000 a year each, all being appointed by the Governor. More than that, the Governor appoints the sheriffs and justices of the peace for the whole State. Every sheriff and justice of the peace of the State of Florida is to hold his office at the beck and nod of Governor Reed, the postal agent of the Postmaster General. Who these various officers are to be I do not know; we shall probably find out when we admit the State.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to ask my colleague whether this constitution, with all the provisions to which he refers, was not submitted to the people and adopted by them?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I was coming to that. I am aware that the argument will be made that this constitution, with all its provisions, was submitted to the people. So it was, and with all the Federal office-holders of that State in favor of it. They say it was adopted by the loyal votes of Florida. On the contrary, loyal men in Florida say that it was adopted by the rebel votes; for, mark you, this constitution provides that every man in Florida shall vote. Nobody is excluded from the right of suffrage under this constitution. Though a man be covered all over, from the crown of his head to the sole of his foot, with the sin of rebellion and the blood of our slaughtered soldiers, he can vote under this constitution.

There are many other things of which, if I had time, I would like to speak. I might refer to the apportionment of representatives. By this constitution representatives in the Legislature of Florida are apportioned in such a manner as to give to the sparsely-populated portions of the State the control of the Legislature. The sparsely-populated parts of the State are those where there are very few negroes, the parts inhabited by the white rebels, the men who, coming in from Georgia, Alabama, and other States, control the fortunes of their several counties. By this constitution every county in that State is entitled to a representative. There are in that State counties that have not thirty registered voters; yet, under this constitution, every one of those counties is entitled to a representative in the Legislature; while the populous counties are entitled to only one representative each, with an additional representative for every thousand inhabitants.

I say to this House that there never was such a constitution framed by any State of this Union as that which has been framed by this so-called State of Florida. In my opinion, it will be wise, very wise for this House to reject the State of Florida until she shall come here with cleaner hands than she now presents.

Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to say anything further upon this question.

Mr. PAINE. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] yield the floor to me?

Mr. BINGHAM. How long a time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. PAINE. Ten minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, yes.

Mr. PAINE. Mr. Speaker, it is not without great reluctance and real pain that I find myself compelled to oppose that portion of the report of the committee which favors the inclusion of Florida in this bill. I would be strongly in favor of concurring in the amendments of the Senate with an amendment striking out Florida. The government of that State is to a considerable extent in the hands, and I understand is destined to be in the hands, of citizens of my own State, of some of whom I am the warm personal friend, and hence it affords me deep regret to be compelled, in the interest of what I believe to be justice and fair play, to oppose the inclusion of Florida in this bill.

As the bill passed this House it did not include that State. Florida has been ingrafted upon our bill by the Senate; and I rise now to oppose the Senate substitute so far as Florida is concerned, and to give to the House, as I am bound to, my reasons for opposing it. I can do no less than this, because it has been my duty as a member of the committee to scrutinize this constitution. I ought to explain to the House its character. After I have done that it will be for each member to decide himself whether he will or will not vote for concurrence.

Now, sir, in 1860 the census gave Florida a population of 140,425. Florida is inferior in wealth, and, I believe, in numbers, to the average congressional districts of the United States. I have no idea that there is in the State of Florida this day one half, if, indeed, there is one third, of the wealth or the ability to bear the burdens of taxation that is to be found in the average congressional districts of the United States. At the last election 24,819 votes were cast. The number of registered voters was 28,003. This differs but little from the vote cast in the several congressional districts of the United States. I have a copy of the constitution of Florida in my hand, and from the provisions of that instrument relating to the appointment and election of the officers of the State I will show to the House what officers are appointed by the Governor with the consent of the Senate, what officers are appointed without the advice or consent of the Senate, and what officers are elected by the people, with the terms of each and their salaries, so far as they are fixed by the constitution. Of all the officers of that State the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, Legislature, and constables alone are elected by the people. The following officers are to be appointed by the Governor by and with the advice and consent of the Senate: one chief justice for life, with a salary of $4,500; two associate justices for life, at a salary of $4,000; seven circuit judges for eight years, with salaries to be fixed by the Legislature; thirty-nine county judges for four years, with salaries to be fixed by the Legislature; seven State attorneys for four years, with salaries to be fixed by the Legislature; thirty-nine sheriffs for four years, with salaries to be fixed by the Legislature; thirty-nine circuit court clerks for four years, with salaries to be fixed by the Legislature; one secretary of State for four years, at a salary of $4,000; one attorney general for four years, with a salary of $3,000; one comptroller for four years, at a salary of $3,000; one treasurer for four years, at a salary of $3,000; one surveyor general for four years, at a salary of $3,000; one superintendent of public instruction for four years, at a salary of $3,000; one adjutant general for four years, at a salary of $3,000; one commissioner of immigration for four years, at a salary of $3,000; two major generals, term and salary not fixed; four brigadier generals, term and salary not fixed; all militia officers in the State; thirty-nine county assessors for two years, salaries to be fixed by the Legislature; thirty-nine county collectors of taxes for two years, with salaries to be fixed by the Legislature. All these officers are to be appointed for that insignificant State, probably inferior in population, and certainly inferior in wealth, to the average congressional districts of the country, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and all the salaries which I have indicated are fixed by the constitution.

I come now to the list of officers to be appointed without the consent of the Senate. They are thirty-nine county treasurers for two years; thirty-nine county surveyors for two years; thirty-nine county superintendents for common schools, each for two years; one hundred and ninety-five county commissioners, each for two years; and as many justices of peace as the Governor may see fit to appoint, each holding his office for life, or at the pleasure of the Governor.

The Governor is chosen by the people for the term of four years, at a salary fixed by the constitution at $5,000. The Lieutenant Governor is chosen by the people for four years, with a salary fixed by the constitution at $2,500. Fifty-three representatives are chosen by the people, each for two years, at a salary of $500, fixed by the constitution, beside mileage. Twenty-four Senators are chosen by the people for four years, at $500 salary, fixed by the constitution, beside mileage; and constables are to be chosen by the people, one for every two hundred people. These are the officers to be elected by the people.

I am asked by a gentleman near me what are to be the total expenses of this government. I have a table showing in separate columns such of the salaries of these officers as are fixed by the Constitution. I have also estimated the salaries which are to be fixed by the Legislature. I have placed these latter at the lowest possible figures, and it appears that the aggregate annual salaries to be paid the officers of this little State will exceed seven hundred thousand dollars, a burden which almost every congressional district represented in this House is better able to bear than Florida. I send to the Clerk the following table:

Now, Mr. Speaker, I cannot consent to fasten upon these people this constitution by approving it to-day in this House. When you come to look at the difficulties in the way of amending the constitution you find additional reasons for hesitating to accept it. I read the constitutional provisions on this subject:

"Any amendment or amendments to this constitution may be proposed in either branch of the Legislature; and if the same shall be agreed upon by a two-thirds vote of all the members elected to each of the two Houses, such proposed amendment or amendments shall be entered on their respective journals, with the yeas and nays thereon, and referred to the Legislature then next to be chosen, and shall be published for three months next preceding the time of making such choice; and if, in the Legislature next chosen as aforesaid, such proposed amendment or amendments shall be agreed to by a two-thirds vote of all the members elected to each House, then it shall be the duty of the Legislature to submit such proposed amendment or amendments to the people in such manner and at such time as the Legislature may prescribe; and if the people shall approve and ratify such amendment or amendments by a majority of the electors qualified to vote for members of the Legislature voting thereon, such amendment or amendments shall become a part of the constitution."

It is necessary that two thirds of two successive Legislatures should adopt an amendment to the constitution, and then that the people should ratify it by their own vote. When you consider, sir, that the Governor of the State has the entire patronage of the State, so far as the appointment of executive, administrative, and judicial officers, justices of the peace, and all county officers is concerned, you must see how utterly impossible it will be for the people to shake off the provisions of this constitution which we shall to-day by our votes, if we concur in the amendments of the Senate, fasten upon the people of the State of Florida.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield ten minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I have only the interest in the State of Florida that any other gentleman in the House has; and I only desire a few moments to relieve the provisions of this bill from the argument to prejudice which my friend has put before the House; for after all it is an argument to prejudice.

In the first place, let us examine the method of amending provided for by the constitution of Florida, which he thinks is highly improper and detrimental to the interests of a republican form of government. It is exactly the provision contained in the constitution of the State of Massachusetts; it is exactly the provision of the constitution of the State of New Hampshire; and in Massachusetts we have five times amended our constitution when we have found it necessary. Besides, in New Hampshire it takes two thirds of the people, as my friend from New Hampshire suggests. The fact is that the good people of Florida have taken the old constitution of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Maine, and have ingrafted provisions suitable to their condition upon it, and made it their constitution; and the argument made here goes exactly to the constitutions made by our fathers in 1789, and so downward, under which we have lived and grown to man's estate, without being aware we were not living under a truly republican form of government.

Now, then, in regard to the formidable list of State officers here presented. There are thirty-nine counties in Florida, therefore there must be thirty-nine county assessors. Which county will the gentleman leave without one? There are thirty-nine counties, and there must be thirty-nine county judges, thirty-nine sheriffs, thirty-nine county clerks, and thirty-nine collectors of county taxes.

Again, it is said the constitution of Florida is not republican because these officers are appointed by the Governor. Why, sir, up to 1855, every State officer in the States of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Maine was appointed by the Governor or by the Legislature, and we did not have the advice and consent of the Senate to a single appointment of the Governor. And yet we have an idea in Massachusetts that we were reasonably republican in our State Governments.

Let me say another thing. In 1855, under the Know-Nothing Legislature, we amended our constitution in this regard; we elected these officers, every one of them. Now, the proposition in Massachusetts is to come back to the appointment of these officers because it is found that local elections of prosecuting officers give local control to the administration of justice, and bring with them influences which are prejudicial to public interests.

Now, let me say a word upon this subject in another view. My friend has given you an argument drawn from the number of inhabitants of the State of Florida. What are you to do with her? To make a Territory of her? My friend from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] says yes.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. As the gentleman has stated what I said, let me add that, so far as I am concerned, I would remand Florida back to her territorial condition. I do not want her to come here with two Senators to offset the Senators from Illinois or Pennsylvania or New York, and particularly under this constitution. She would get into rebel hands under it.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not yield to you, my friend. Now, let me ask, in answer to that, has she not as many inhabitants as Colorado had, for the admission of which the gentleman voted?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I beg your pardon; I voted against it.

Mr. BUTLER. Very well; I am glad the gentleman had so much good sense. Has she not as many as Nebraska had when she was admitted? [Cries of "Oh, no!"] She has, indeed, and more. Has she not as many as Nevada had? Has she not as many as Wisconsin had when she was admitted? [Cries of "No, no!"] "Yes; but the people were different." I am talking about heads now; not hearts. I am talking about numbers. If you are going to make this the rule, then send back these gentlemen from these other States, and remit those States to a territorial condition.

Now, then, it is said that Florida went into the rebellion. So she did. She could not do otherwise, situated as she was. I have nothing to ask for her on that account. But true men, loyal men, good men have gone down there, and have regenerated that State. Twenty-four thousand votes were cast, and that was a very large number out of a population of one hundred and sixty thousand. Twenty-eight thousand voters registered, and twenty-four thousand votes were cast, and of that number the Union men had eight thousand majority for this State government, although there was a division, under the lead of an Illinois man, both in the convention and at the election. I say there was a division in the convention, under the lead of an Illinois man, and General Meade was sent for to heal the difficulty.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. BUTLER. I have not time.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. You can get your time extended.

Mr. BUTLER. If you will get my time extended, I will yield.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] to extend the gentleman's time five minutes that I may put a question to him.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will do so.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman says that under the lead of an Illinois man a division was attempted in the convention of Florida.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I suppose he alludes to the first president of the convention, Mr. Richards. According to the report of the men who made this constitution, when the convention first assembled Mr. Richards was legally elected president of the convention. He was not the man who undertook to create a division. It was these other men who withdrew from the convention and subsequently came back at midnight on Sunday and by force broke open the hall and took possession of it. That was where the division first began after the convention had been duly organized.

Mr. BUTLER. Well, was not that the proper time to come back? The convention had adjourned till Monday, and it was necessary that they should come back on Monday morning.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The men who adjourned the convention were not the men who came back. The men who took possession of the hall were the men who had stayed away.

Mr. BUTLER. I cannot yield further. I was about saying that they came back and took possession of the hall, from which they had been driven by force, and that thereupon General Meade was sent for, and he came down and reinstated these men. The gentleman himself says that the others were kept out by bayonets. Whose bayonets, I pray? The bayonets of the United States, under the orders of the commanding general who went down there.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BUTLER. I cannot be interrupted.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I wish to correct a misstatement.

Mr. BUTLER. You have told your side of the story.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have the statements of both sides in my hand.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand precisely how it is. The gentleman has heard Mr. Richards's story, and comes here and retails it to the House. I have heard the other side, and I am going to put before the House such information as I can.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BUTLER. I cannot.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I got the gentleman's time extended five minutes, and I think he should yield me some of it.

Mr. CHANLER. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] extended the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] on condition that he should yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH.]

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, no! I yielded five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] so that he might answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH.]

Mr. BUTLER. And which I did answer as well as I could.

I now desire to go a little further into this matter. General Meade went down there and sustained the convention. After that the constitution was submitted to the people, and the people ratified it by a majority almost two to one.

What was done next? The Legislature of that State got together and ratified the fourteenth constitutional amendment. On the 15th of this month that Legislature is to elect officers; and on the 16th United States Senators are to be elected.

Now, I want to deal with another argument of gentlemen here. Mr. Reed, the Governor-elect, had been employed there; and thereupon the unfriendly liars who opposed him insisted all around that he was at work to endeavor to elect Postmaster General Randall a United States Senator from that State. That story was set afloat, and I am sorry to say has found some believers. That will be settled on the 16th of this month. But they have no more intention of electing Alexander Randall, and he is no more eligible, than my friend from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH;] not a bit; and there is no more danger of his being elected.

Now let me answer the statement of the gentleman from Illinois on my right, [Mr. WASHBURN.] He said he would remit Florida back to its territorial condition. Very well, gentlemen, if you will put all these southern States back into a territorial condition I will go with you. But if you are going to rehabilitate any of these States after their rebellion then serve all alike.

When Texas was admitted into the Union she was admitted with two members of Congress and twelve thousand voters. And it is now proposed by some gentlemen to cut up that State into two, three, or four States.

But time presses, and I must speak briefly on these different points. In the first place, this State organization of Florida has the approval of General Meade. In the next place, it has the approval of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and of the Senate. In the third place, it has the approval of a majority of the Reconstruction Committee of this House. Now, are these men all so deceived, and is all virtue—no, I will take that back—is all knowledge of the subject confined to my friends from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN and Mr. FARNSWORTH,] and my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE?]

All these arguments, all these statements, all the provisions of this constitution have been submitted to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and they have found the constitution republican and proper. This constitution has been submitted to the Senate, and they have found it republican and proper. It has been submitted to your own Committee on Reconstruction, and they have found it republican and proper, and have reported it to this House. Now, if you set the example of going back on the matter of reconstruction, I have no doubt there are a good many ready to follow that example. If I were to follow my own ideas altogether, unrestrained by party associations, upon this as a mere matter of policy, I should doubt very much the policy of rehabilitating any one of these southern States. But I hold it as a question of policy as to when these States should be admitted, and not a question of principle, and upon that I feel bound by my party ties. Therefore I shall vote for this bill. I shall hope to see Florida again represented in Congress. I consider that State more certain for the Union and more determined against rebellion than any other of these States, because into that State have gone a great number of northern emigrants to settle there, and she is more sure for the Union than any other southern State.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HULBURD. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] yield to me for a few minutes?

Mr. BINGHAM. I will yield to my colleague on the committee for ten minutes.

Mr. HULBURD. Mr. Speaker, when the matter of Florida originally came before the Committee on Reconstruction I concurred with my colleagues on that committee in opposing its admission. And when we originally reported this bill to the House the State of Florida was not embraced in it. There were objections made to the constitution which led me to vote against it.

Since that time the constitution has been objected to has been submitted to the people of Florida, and they, as has already been stated, by a vote of nearly two to one, have accepted that constitution, and ratified it so far as they could ratify it. They now ask that we should admit them into the Union under that constitution.

Now, my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] objects to some of the provisions contained in that constitution, especially the provision conferring so sweeping an appointing power on the Governor. To that argument the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has very well answered that the appointing power vested in the Governor under the constitution of Florida is no greater than that formerly exercised by the executive in the New England States and in the State of New York. The real reason for this vesting the appointing power in the Governor of Florida has not yet been stated. I propose briefly to state it, that members of the House may understand the reason for this apparent anomaly.

Among the thirty-nine counties of the State of Florida there are several in which rebel voters are now in the ascendancy. If they are allowed to erect their county organizations by electing county officers it will be done by rebel hands, under rebel auspices, and for rebel purposes. Now, there has been vested in the hands of the Governor the power to make these appointments to insure loyal Union organizations in all the counties. Is not that right, and therefore proper? I do not understand that Governor Reed, the Governor-elect, is charged by anybody with being in sympathy at all with disloyalty or rebellion. His nominations, therefore, will be in the interest of loyalty, of patriotism, of Unionism. It is urged that if these appointments are thus made and have four undisturbed years to run all the counties, including the now rebel counties, will become loyalized and Unionized, so that thereafter they will be true and loyal, part and parcel of a loyal State. Is not that desirable? Is it not worth an effort?

But it is asked—and this is one of the objections made by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE]—why not change after that time this provision with regard to the appointing power? Why, sir, provision is made in this very constitution for a revision and modification of any of its provisions, except those affecting the franchise rights, whenever the people of Florida dislike the lodgment of so much power in the hands of the gubernatorial officer. A majority vote of two successive Legislatures and a submission to, and approval by, the voters are all the preliminaries required.

But the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] objects to the high salaries which are provided for. Why, sir, is it desirable that we here should take into consideration and fix the salaries of the Governor and other officers of the various States of this Union? Suppose we should be called on to say the salary of the Governor of Vermont, which is only $700, ought to be raised to $7,000. We might, with as much propriety, interfere in that matter; as to say that because the State of Florida has provided high salaries for her State officers we will keep her out of the Union till she reduces those salaries to suit our views. It is very well known that the southern States have always been in the habit of paying their officers higher salaries than those received by the same officials of our northern States. I understand that before the rebellion the salaries paid to the officers of all the southern States were high in comparison with those paid by the States of the North. Is that anything that concerns us? I cannot see the force of an objection founded upon this matter of salaries. So long as the suffrage rights of all the population, without regard to grade, condition, or color, have been cared for, have been properly secured, and the spirit of the reconstruction acts have been complied with, I cannot see how or why we should oppose the admission of Florida because we object to some details involving no general principles or rights, about salaries provided for in the constitution, or because we think the appointing power is too largely vested in the executive of the State, or because we, perchance, differ about the propriety of several of the subordinate local, county, and State officers holding office for the term of four years.

Mr. BROMWELL. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBURD] whether he thinks it entirely safe to trust so important a consideration as the loyal organization of a State entirely in the hands of one man, so that if he should prove recreant, or, dying, should be succeeded by the Lieutenant Governor, there would be nothing to hinder the entire organization of the State from being committed to the hands of rebels.

Mr. HULBURD. Sir, the people of the State of Florida have not made the tremendous mistake that was made at Baltimore in 1864, by selecting for their second officer a thing who cannot be trusted in case the executive power should devolve upon that officer.

Mr. BROMWELL. But does not the whole thing depend upon one man's fidelity; and if he should die is the man who would succeed him as good as he is?

Mr. HULBURD. He is, I believe, an honest and true, capable loyal man. But, sir, this whole objection arises, as I understand, because a citizen of Illinois went down there and did not succeed in obtaining the majority which he expected. When he went before the people and asked that his particular views and representations should be carried out he succeeded in getting elected only six members of the Assembly. If that Illinois man had succeeded in getting the control of the organization of the State doubtless there would have been no objection here now to the admission of the State, for she cannot be kept out longer on any principle of consistency, I had almost said of decency.

Mr. BROMWELL. I wish to say, so far as I am concerned, that it has nothing to do with this matter what the performances of Mr. Richards have been there, and I have never had any idea that his welfare had anything to do with this matter.

Mr. HULBURD. The constitution of Florida was approved by General Meade, and I say now approved by a majority of the Committee on Reconstruction of this House, who were formerly opposed to its adoption. Is there any good reason, founded on fundamental principle, why this House should not now approve of this bill as amended by the Senate?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. My friend will say when the Committee on Reconstruction approved of this constitution of Florida.

Mr. HULBURD. If it were right I could state what occurred in the committee-room. If my friend will allow me, I will do so.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do.

Mr. HULBURD. I understood my friend from Illinois to say in the committee-room this morning that he regarded the constitution of Florida as the best constitution that any of the southern States had adopted.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. I never made any remark like that, and the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. HULBURD. I understood the gentleman to say that it was the best constitution that had been adopted by any of the southern States.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. HULBURD. What, then, was the gentleman's remark, and to what did it apply?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I may have made a remark in reference to Alabama.

Mr. HULBURD. I was under the impression the gentleman also made this remark in reference to the constitution of Florida.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman will do me the justice to say that I said nothing of the kind in reference to the constitution of Florida.

Mr. HULBURD. I did so understand the gentleman; but of course I may have been mistaken.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The Committee on Reconstruction have unanimously and repeatedly declared against this constitution of Florida.

Mr. HULBURD. Yes, they have; but not since the constitution was submitted and sanctioned by the people.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Repeatedly; and they do now; but they say that we had better admit the State.

The SPEAKER. The ten minutes of the gentleman from New York have expired.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BAKER. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that as this legislation involves some large questions of law and policy, and as three or five minutes are too short a time in which to discuss them, I will content myself with asking leave to print some remarks on this and the Arkansas bill.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly. [See Appendix.]

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to delay the House with an extended discussion of this bill. I desire to obtain the action of the House speedily on the bill; and having stated very briefly my own views touching the bill, and the reasons why it should pass the House, I will call for the previous question.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to move to strike out Alabama as well as Florida.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield for that amendment to be offered.

The SPEAKER. The question will be taken separately on them.

Mr. BINGHAM. On the subject of Alabama I suppose the House to be concluded. It has heretofore voted on the question of admitting Alabama to representation, and its constitution has not since changed, nor is the bill as to Alabama changed by any of the amendments of the Senate. Therefore it is not my purpose to make any further remark on that point.

Touching the objection, sir, that has been raised as to the admission of Florida, it seems to me gentlemen have spoken in haste. They cannot expect the House of Representatives, acting on the suggestions made here in opposition to the constitution of Florida, to condemn the continuous record of the Republic, without exception, for nearly the first forty years of its existence. I undertake to say, Mr. Speaker, of the constitution of the original thirteen States, the constitution of Florida, touching the appointment of judicial and executive officers, is substantially a transcript. It will not do for the House of Representatives at this time of day to declare that the constitutions of the original States of the Union, for the first forty years of our national existence, were not republican, and not in conformity with the Constitution of the United States.

Allow me to state further, Mr. Speaker, that several of the new States, upon their admission into the Union under the Constitution, conformed their constitutions in this behalf to the very provisions of this constitution of Florida and of the original thirteen States. The constitution of my own State, Ohio, followed that precedent, and gentlemen know right well that until within the last eighteen years when that constitution was amended, in 1850, all judicial officers in the State of Ohio were appointed in the same mode and manner as is prescribed in the constitution of Florida. I never heard, Mr. Speaker, the question raised that the constitution of Ohio, adopted in 1802, was not republican.

This is all I have occasion to say upon that point. Touching the other point suggested by the gentleman as to the sparseness of population, I pray gentlemen to hesitate long before they venture to decide that the people of Florida are not sufficiently numerous to constitute a State of this Union, when in point of fact that State is as populous to-day as it ever was at any time after the admission of that State into the Union of the States. There is as much population there to-day as ever there was. It will not do for men who represent the great body of the American people, after all the record that has been made upon this subject, to come and say that the people of Florida are not sufficiently numerous to constitute a State of the Union. Much less will it do for the majority of this House, after the record they made upon the question of the admission of Colorado into the Union as a State with only some six thousand voters, to come and say in the face of that record—with twenty-four thousand votes cast in Florida under the operation and limitation of your own laws for the new constitution of that State—that there is not sufficient population in Florida to constitute a State.

Neither will it do, Mr. Speaker, for gentlemen who stand here representing the democratic ideas of America to come and condemn a constitution, in the presence of which the constitutions of half the States of the Union pale touching the question of democratic rights and privileges, and vote this constitution down on that ground. The constitution of Florida makes no discrimination between American citizens of full age being made persons resident in the State, but secures the equal right of suffrage to every one of them upon one year's residence. That accords exactly with my ideas of democracy, as I believe it accords exactly with the ideas of democracy entertained by four fifths of the whole body of the American people. The constitution, sir, is democratic by all the traditions of the Republic. It is republican by all the interpretations of the Constitution of the United States.

Having said this, I shall vote, if I shall vote alone, for the admission of Florida. And I vote for the admission of the five remaining States named in the bill upon the same ground that I would vote for the admission of Florida, to wit, that their constitutions are republican and their provisions for the exercise of the elective franchise democratic; and above all—and it is to this I call the attention of this House and of this country—because upon the admission of these six States, upon the express condition named in the bill, may depend the final ratification and incorporation into the Constitution of the Republic of the fourteenth article of amendment.

Oregon but the other day, under the operation of the apostate in the White House, elected a Legislature adverse to—

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I will not call the gentleman to order, but he ought to be.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls the gentleman from Ohio to order.

Mr. BROOKS. No, sir, I do not, upon reflection.

Mr. BINGHAM. Perhaps I ought not to have said it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear what the words were.

Mr. BROOKS. Impeachment is over, and that sort of language is done.

Mr. BINGHAM. It is not quite over.

Mr. BROOKS. Well, go on.

Mr. BINGHAM. There is another tribunal before which we are to try impeachment.

A MEMBER. A post-mortem? [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. Never mind the post-mortem. I mean the great body of the American people; they are not dead nor the subjects of a post-mortem.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. BINGHAM. Not now.

Mr. ROBINSON. I thought not.

Mr. BINGHAM. I was calling attention to the fact that—

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Will my colleague allow me to ask a question and make a short statement?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. In the first place, the question I desire to ask my colleague, and which he will answer at his convenience as he proceeds with his remarks, is whether the committee find, and whether in his judgment the fact be so, that Florida, in presenting herself for readmission to her Federal relations, has conformed to the requirements of the acts of Congress relating to that matter? And if Florida has complied with those acts of Congress in substance and in spirit, then the remark that I wish to make is that my own mind furnishes an answer to all that has been said in the way of objections to the details of the constitution of Florida, and it is that those details relate to matters not affecting the loyalty and safety of the government which is presented for our approval and for the guarantee of the United States. They relate to matters of detail which the people at all times have power to control, and it would be to my mind a strange and wrong position for the Congress to take, to exclude from representation a State on the ground that its constitution in these matters of detail, which do not go to the matter of loyalty, or of safety, or of propriety of being guaranteed, may not be in accordance with the minds of some of us.

And permit me, in conclusion, to say this: that so far as my memory goes, in all the action of Congress the principle upon which we have acted—I mean the majority in Congress, who have the responsibility of rehabilitating these States and welcoming them back as speedily as possible, with the invocation of God's blessing and the blessing of all good men upon them—I say the principle upon which we have acted has been not to control in details, not to take microscopic views of the constitution, &c., that they present, but simply to see that they are loyal and republican and safe. It was rebellion that dashed them from their orbits, and as soon as the rebellious spirit is purged from them, and they are made right in regard to loyalty, let us welcome them back. That has been from the first and will be to the last my own view of this subject.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am glad that my colleague has said what he has said, and especially that he has asked me the question whether Florida has complied with the requirements of the reconstruction acts in the matter of reorganization. I answer him emphatically and directly that she has, and I challenge contradiction from any quarter.

I agree with my colleague that we have no right to question a State about the local details of her constitution, which do not touch the general safety of the Republic and do not conflict with the requirements of the Constitution of the United States or any existing statute law. But, sir, I ask the House to consider the point upon which I was dwelling when my colleague interrupted me so opportunely and so properly, that it does concern the safety of this Republic whether the fourteenth article of amendments shall become part of the fundamental law of the nation. The condition precedent incorporated in this bill, which now presses for decision before this House, is that not one of the six States named in it shall come to political power save upon the condition that its Legislature shall in due form ratify the fourteenth article of amendment. I stand here, Mr. Speaker, to proclaim that by that act of ratification, upon every theory, the fourteenth article becomes part of the Constitution of the United States, and becomes thereby, for all the great hereafter, a rock of safety to all the people of the Republic. It puts an end forever to this wild and guilty fantasy that there is a sovereignty residing in any State of the Union superior to the sovereignty of the Republic; it puts an end forever to the mad declaration of demagogues that it is competent for any State of this Union to enact an ordinance of secession or to levy taxes to the extent of a single farthing for the purpose of waging war against the supremacy of the Republic and the supremacy of its laws.

Mr. Speaker, it does strike me that the decision of this very question upon which the House is about to pronounce may in some sort affect not merely the stability of a political party in this country, but may in some sort touch the stability and perpetuity of the Republic.

I am willing to take all the consequences, and therefore ask that the House will now second the previous question. After that has been done, if some gentlemen desire to be heard to any reasonable extent, I am perfectly willing they shall be heard in the hour to which I will be entitled.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] yield to me for a few minutes upon the question of the proceedings in Florida being in accordance with the reconstruction acts of Congress?

Mr. BINGHAM. After the previous question is seconded I will yield to the gentleman.

The previous question was then seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] has forty-eight minutes of his hour left, having occupied twelve minutes of his time before the previous question was called.

Mr. SPALDING. I understand that both Houses of Congress have agreed to the admission of Alabama, and therefore I will withdraw my motion to strike out of the Senate amendment all that relates to Alabama.

Mr. BINGHAM. I now yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS,] my associate on the Committee of Reconstruction.

Mr. BROOKS. I am well aware that whatever may be said on this subject on this side of the House is said to unwilling ears. It is not, therefore, from any desire to address this House that I shall make the few remarks that I am about to make, but because it is a part of my duty, as a member of the Committee on Reconstruction, to oppose the passage of all such bills as this.

And first, let me refer to the remark of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] on the other side of the Chamber, that it is not the business of Congress to look into and change constitutions, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH.] He says that as constitutions are framed by the people, it is the duty of the House to submit to the judgment of the people who framed those constitutions. But what is the spectacle presented by this very bill? Georgia presents here a constitution with a provision relating to homesteads.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Will the gentleman permit me to correct him in relation to a slight misapprehension he has made of what I said?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I did not say, and I do not think it will be found that I said, that it is not the duty of Congress to look into the constitutions presented by the States. I said that it was not proper for Congress to look into those details of the constitutions which are under the control of the people at all times, and which do not at all affect the loyalty of the people of the State.

Mr. BROOKS. I understand the gentleman. Yet in this very bill we have looked behind the constitution of Georgia and propose to strike out of that constitution all that relates to the homesteads which the people of Georgia have secured to themselves. With a microscopic view the Committee on Reconstruction, or a majority of them, have looked into the details of the constitution of Georgia, and propose to strike out of it certain provisions.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] says all we have to do is to look to the loyalty of the people; in other words, to look to the politics of the people; for in the modern acceptance of the term, with the metamorphosis which the definition of the word has undergone since Webster, Worcester, and other lexicographers gave the definition, loyalty has now come to mean only an agreement with the views of the majority of this House; or, in other words, an indorsement of the radicalism of the country.

Now, I will not say in regard to loyalty what Dr. Johnson said about patriotism, for it would not be in order. Dr. Johnson said that patriotism was the last refuge of scoundrels. Now, I will not say that loyalty is the last refuge of scoundrels, for even if I were disposed to do so it would not be within the bounds of order for me, even metaphorically, to make a declaration like that on the floor of this House. But I do say that loyalty now means accord with the party in power. And hereafter lexicographers, if they make definitions founded upon the action of this House, will be obliged to change their old definition of "loyalty" from lealty or loyalty to law, and define it to mean only allegiance to the Republican party, to the party in power.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] on my left, avows plainly and directly before the country, and I admire the audacity with which he avows it, that the whole and sole object of incorporating Florida in this bill is to secure the ratification of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman will excuse me, but I said neither the whole nor the sole of it.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not wish to misrepresent the gentleman. Let him repeat what he said.

Mr. BINGHAM. Well, I said nothing of the kind. I said that upon the admission of the sixth State might depend the ratification of that amendment; and I stated that as a strong reason why the State should be admitted.

Mr. BROOKS. Ah, that is simply the same idea in other words; or, in point of fact, the gentleman has consulted his arithmetic, his addition and subtraction, and by the process of two of the great rules of arithmetic he has come to the conclusion that unless Florida be included in this omnibus bill the proposed fourteenth article of the amendments of the Constitution cannot be carried; that it is necessary, in order to carry that amendment, to include Florida in this bill, and to admit her with these other States. That is the idea which the gentleman avows. So that while one gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] avows "loyalty," alias Republicanism, as his definition of the standard by which the admission of States is to be determined, the other gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] lays it down as his fundamental creed that in order to change the Constitution of the country, it is necessary, according to his arithmetic, no matter what may be the constitution of Florida, no matter whether the State may be rebellious or anti-rebellious, to overlook and override all other considerations and to admit the State for that object, if not for that object alone. And this is an argument which he addresses to the intelligence, to the patriotism, to the loyalty of the other side of the House, in order to consolidate those ranks over there which have been divided; and he thinks that by an appeal of this sort, altogether of a party character, he can make men change their opinions; and for that purpose, if not for that purpose alone, to alter the very fundamental law of this country. I admire the audacity of that avowal. It may be useful, if not now, hereafter, that posterity may see why and with reference to what the Constitution of the country has been changed.

Sir, if I could look upon this question as being, what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] declares it to be, a question not of principle but of policy, I do not know but that I should agree with him as to the admission of the State of Florida in this omnibus bill. Sir, the party in power will reap no profit hereafter from this arrangement. Conceived in fraud, brought forth in iniquity, as this constitution and that convention were, the admission of the State under such an organization, though it may serve the temporary purpose of securing a change in the Federal Constitution, can result in no good, but rather detriment, to the party in power.

As I have before stated on this floor, two sets of Yankees—"carpet-baggers" from the North and the West—one set from the distant State of Wisconsin, and the other from New England, not having been absent from there long enough to have lost the nasal twang with which they started from their original homes, came before the Reconstruction Committee and contested long and earnestly the question which set of these "carpet-baggers" properly represented the sentiment of the State of Florida. So earnest had been this same contest in that State that General Meade was brought from his headquarters at Atlanta to settle the controversy between the two contending factions of the convention. Equally earnest, equally fruitful in invective and denunciation were these two sets of Yankees that appeared before the Reconstruction Committee. By this bill the Wisconsin set of Yankees is received and the New England set rejected; and the constitution and laws of the State have been so arranged that when the Governor-elect of the State shall be elected to the United States Senate, as he will be, the Lieutenant Governor, also from Wisconsin, steps in and becomes the Governor, with all the appointing power and all the patronage which this bill will concentrate in the hands of that officer. Sir, not only was the constitution conceived in fraud, but the elections were brought forth in iniquity.

We are told that there are twenty-four thousand voters in the State of Florida. The marvel is between these two sets of contending Yankees before the negroes of Florida that the twenty-four thousand was not aggravated into the number of two hundred and forty thousand voters. If the contest had been severe and sharp enough before the ignorant negroes of Florida these votes might not only have been multiplied, but doubled and quadrupled, increased from twenty-four thousand to two hundred and forty thousand. Give me a committee of this House to visit the State of Florida, and I will show that in no primary election in the State of New York ever conceived there in fraud, and never in any place whatever, in the innermost recesses of any invisible groshop, was ever conceived a system of election more fraudulent, more rascally, more villainous than the mass of these elections in the various counties of Florida. Yet here, without investigation, without looking behind the record at all, the honorable gentleman from Ohio comes in and tells us twenty-four thousand voters have voted to support this constitution of Florida.

The other honorable gentlemen from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] says that he would not look with a microscopic eye into these constitutions at all; and yet in this Florida constitution, in an amendment not submitted here, but in the Senate, in an amendment which comes down to us from the Senate, is a fundamental law fixed by us, a law as irreversible, as irrepensible, as immutable as the laws of the Medes and Persians, a law which puts it out of the power of Florida hereafter to regulate suffrage at their own election, which fixes and ingrafts upon the constitution of Florida for all time to come an immutable law in reference to the right of suffrage in Florida. Sir, this is not the work of Florida. This is the microscopic view of the two Houses of Congress in order to fix forever the right of the negroes to suffrage.

Sir, you legislate in this way in vain. The intelligence, the education of the country, to say nothing of the white race of the country, must govern there as everywhere else in the land.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I wish the gentleman from Ohio to yield to me for five minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the gentleman for five minutes.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to say a word in reference to the regularity of the proceedings under the reconstruction law. I hold in my hands the proceedings of what is called the Reed party, submitted to the Reconstruction Committee by Lieutenant Governor Gleason. I will read from that statement:

"The convention met, pursuant to General Pope's order, upon the 20th of January. There were only twenty-nine delegates present of the forty-six elected, in consequence of the lack of facilities for traveling, the State being nearly destitute of railroads, and the steamboat communication irregular and uncertain. An effort was made to postpone the election of president until absent members could arrive, but the friends of Daniel Richards objected to any delay, and he was elected as president of the convention."

I will not read further. I can state the facts in fewer words. They became dissatisfied with the rulings of the convention and with the appointment of the committees. Those who were thus dissatisfied left the convention for the purpose of leaving it without a quorum. They learned afterward the convention had made up a constitution, and had adjourned in order to hear from General Meade. They therefore returned, I think about eleven o'clock at night, and took possession of the hall. They then passed a resolution entering their solemn protest against the unauthorized, unprecedented, and arbitrary conduct of the presiding officer, Daniel Richards; that, himself ineligible to a seat in this body, as shown by the certificates of the board of registration, he had appointed a committee of three ineligible persons to determine the question of eligibility, and when an addition was asked to that committee he had refused to allow them to report. Then, at the close of the proceedings—and to this fact I desire also to call the attention of my colleague—in order to get the signatures of the delegates in that convention, they passed an ordinance that no delegate should have his pay unless he signed the constitution. That ordinance was passed by the convention. It is not to be found in the constitution, because it was not an ordinance to be submitted to the people. But both parties testified before the Committee on Reconstruction to that fact. The committee heard the statement of both parties when they were both present, so there was no possible chance of mistake in regard to the fact. I submit to my colleague whether this makes the proceedings regular and in accordance with the act of Congress.

Mr. BINGHAM. It is a very easy matter, I think, to answer all that has been said by my colleague on the committee [Mr. FARNSWORTH] touching the irregularity of this proceeding. It is very well settled in this country that the presentation of a constitution by the people of any organized Territory, or of any disorganized State of the Union, if you please, is a mere exercise of the right of petition; and it would be a sad day for the people of any State or Territory if it were in the power of their elected delegates in convention assembled by withdrawing in any manner from the convention to take away from them their undoubted right, upon their own motion, if you please, not contrary to law, but subordinate to it, to frame a constitution, vote upon it as your law requires, and present it to the Congress of the United States for approval. It is a question that was settled nearly forty years ago under the administration of President Jackson, settled in the light of an opinion delivered to the Congress of the United States by his distinguished and learned Attorney General, and from that day to this I have never seen it challenged by any man of any party deliberately, in Congress or out of it. It is for the people to pass upon the constitution of Florida, adopted by the people under your own law, no matter who draws up the form. It is for the people to pass upon it. That is the substance of your law; that the people may adopt constitutions of government in the late insurgent States.

Mr. WOODWARD. I ask the gentleman to name a State of this Confederacy which has had its constitution forced upon it by a military power.

Mr. BINGHAM. In the first place we have no confederacy. There was a confederacy sometime ago whose capital was in Richmond, but we have got no confederacy and no confederation now. We have a nationality; we have a Republic.

Mr. WOODWARD. I deny it.

Mr. BINGHAM. I know the gentleman denies it. So does Jefferson Davis.

Mr. WOODWARD. I deny that we have a nationality.

Mr. BINGHAM. I know the gentleman denies that we have a nationality. If we have no nationality, in God's name, by what name are we known among the nations of the earth?

Mr. WOODWARD. The gentleman does not answer my question.

Mr. BINGHAM. I do answer the gentleman's question; but I want to answer one part of it first, and I want him to understand that I do not admit that we are without a nationality. Neither do I admit that we are but a confederacy. It was necessary that there should be this conflict between the gentleman and myself, for it rests upon conviction.

Now, as to the other point suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Woodward,] of a constitution forced upon a people by the bayonet within the Republic as the constitution of a State. I say it has never been done by the Government of the United States, nor is it attempted to be done now. The bayonet did not compel the people to vote. It cannot compel them to vote. The gentleman ought to remember the words of the great tribune of the people of France when he said, "Bayonets have no power over the will of the people." They have no more power over the will of the people than they have over the omnipotence of God himself. You may crush men by the bayonet, you may torture men by the wheel, but you can neither by the force of the bayonet nor the torture of the wheel compel freemen to vote! It is a libel upon the freemen of America, unworthy of the place and unjust to the people for any man to talk about American freemen, either among the everglades of Florida or among the granite hills of New England, being compelled to vote by the bayonet. I tell the gentleman he libels the American character when he intimates that any portion of the freemen of this country anywhere, North, South, East, or West, ever voted by compulsion of the bayonet. They vote voluntarily. They vote as freemen only dare vote, according to the convictions of their own minds and according to the purposes of their own will. That is my answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes, but do not delay me.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman has told us in very emphatic language that bayonets cannot force men to vote. Well, possibly that may be so, although a friend on my left says he has felt the power of the bayonet, and knows it has some compulsion in it. But I put the question to the gentleman if bayonets may not prevent men from voting, and stand between them and the exercise of the right of suffrage?

Mr. BINGHAM. That is another and very different question, sir, and that is the very thing that was done.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. That was the very thing that was done in these States.

Mr. BINGHAM. That was the very thing that was done for four long years by that party that followed the black banner of treason under the lead of gentlemen who called themselves the confederate States of America, and who seem to find an ally in the gentleman from Wisconsin, from the question which he propounds to me. I deny, sir, that American freemen have ever under the laws of Congress or by the will of the great body of the American people been deterred from voting according to their will and pleasure in accordance with the requirements and subject to the limitations of the Constitution of the United States. Twenty-four thousand men in Florida, constituting three fourths of the freemen of the State, entitled either under its ancient constitution or under our own laws of reconstruction to vote, and constituting the body of that people, acted under no coercion whatever. The man is inexcusable who undertakes to raise any such question here. It was in the power of the people of Florida to sit quietly in their homes, and there was no one to make them afraid or to drag them to the polls. On the contrary, they went voluntarily for the purpose of restoring that State, broken and blasted by armed rebellion, to its former place in the Union, and to give to its people their proper political power in the councils of the nation.

Mr. BECK. I would ask the gentleman whether in this very bill you are not seeking to impose upon the people of Alabama a constitution which not only General Meade, but this House, has declared was rejected by the people of that State in the manner provided by your own law, namely, by staying away from the polls?

Mr. BINGHAM. Not at all. It never was any part of the law to which the gentleman refers that those men who stayed away and would not vote either one way or the other should deprive seventy-eight thousand qualified electors of the right of petition; nor was it, as my honorable colleague [Mr. Shellabarger] right well knows, ever the intention of any gentleman upon this floor who had anything to do with framing those bills to put it in the power of a set of men lately in rebellion to take away from the representatives of the people in Congress assembled the right at any time to alter, amend, or repeal their own laws in the interest of the common country and in the interest of the loyal people. Seventy-eight thousand freemen in Alabama voted for that constitution; and the gentleman from Kentucky, when he turns back the records of his country, will find that the party with which he is in some sort of alliance upon this floor deemed it important, in violation of every provision of the Constitution, to admit a foreign State into this Union after the treaty-making power had rejected it, represented by only twelve thousand voters, by joint resolution did admit the then foreign State of Texas. But that was in the interest of that Democracy which made merchandise of men; and this movement to-day is in the interest of that Democracy which secures freedom to all men and equal rights of suffrage, irrespective of social position, irrespective of complexion, irrespective of wealth, upon the simple condition of citizenship, adherence, and loyalty to the Constitution and laws of the United States within the several States of the Union. This is the marked distinction between the positions occupied by that party which the people have broken up and destroyed, and that great party which to-day represents the intellect and the heart and the conscience, not only of America, but of the civilized world.

And this brings me now to the point which I was approaching when the gentleman interrupted me. I desire to reply to the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] my associate on the Committee on Reconstruction. He undertook to limit the meaning of the few opening remarks which I made by incorporating into those remarks the words, "The sole purpose, the only purpose, the whole purpose, of admitting Florida is to secure the ratification of the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States."

Mr. Speaker, before I referred to the fourteenth amendment, I had uttered words which excluded every such conclusion as the gentleman has seen fit to draw from my remarks. I had said that the people of Florida had organized a State government republican in form; I had stated that their constitution was democratic; I had stated in substance that having conformed their constitution and laws to the requirements of the national Constitution, and to the requirements of the congressional acts of reconstruction, it was their right to be restored to political power in this Union, and that it was the duty of Congress, in the exercise of the power vested in it by the whole people of this country, to restore the people of that State to their former place in the Union.

The gentleman says there was audacity in my statement. Audacity in what, sir? Audacity in saying that we should lift up the fallen columns of the Republic? Audacity in saying that we should restore ten States, broken and disorganized by rebellion, to their places in the Union? Audacity to make again this great people one people from sea to sea? Audacity in using the words of the great Declaration to take new securities for the future safety of the people of this country, North and South, East and West? I expressed in those remarks which the gentleman calls audacious, merely the declared will of the people of the United States.

Audacity! Sir, is it not audacity in the gentleman, and in the miserable party which he represents, to undertake to thwart in this manner the solemnly declared will of the American people, from Maine to Oregon? Does not the gentleman know that within the last two years the people of twenty-three organized States of this Union, by overwhelming majorities, have declared that it is their will that the Constitution of the United States shall be so amended that State secession and State rebellion shall hereafter be left without color of excuse, without color of authority in that Constitution? Does he not know that the people within those twenty-three States, representing not less than twenty-five millions of the people of this nation, have not only declared that which I have just stated, but have declared further that no State of this Union shall levy contributions to the extent of a single farthing for the purpose of paying the expenses of rebellion against the Government or the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. BURR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir; not now. I am dealing with the audacity of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks.] I want to know whether it was not audacity in the party which the gentleman undertakes to represent here, after the people of Ohio, by a majority of from forty to fifty thousand, had declared in favor of this fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in a minority in the last vote in the State of Ohio, though by accident a majority in the Legislature, to dare to repeal the recorded will of that people and undertake to revive the expiring fortunes of that rebellion which has covered the land with graves and has filled the land with lamentation?

The gentleman speaks of audacity. Sir, the people will answer that at the polls; they have answered it, and will answer it again.

The gentleman, however, has undertaken to play the rôle of prophet here upon this occasion, and gives us warning that the enactment of this bill, and the admission of those States, and the ratification by them of the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution will not profit us? How does the gentleman come to speak so authoritatively? Has he been gifted with the vision of the seer? Does he suppose that the people of the United States are about to take a step backward; that they are about to legalize treason again under the pretense that the sovereignty of the State is superior to the sovereignty of the nation? Does he suppose that they are going to fall back and adopt the theory suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Woodward,] that they are no nationality after all; that they are only a confederacy of separate and independent States, each sovereign within its own territorial limits? Does he, when he gives out these oracular sayings of his, suppose that the people of the United States are really to entertain for a moment the exploded theories of that great and astute man who so long led the South by the splendor of his intellect and the profundity of his logic, John C. Calhoun, that the Government of the United States is nothing but a mere agent, the principals of which are separate, sovereign, and independent States of the Union? God forbid that the gentleman should prove in this matter a prophet of God, or even a prophet of that inferior being who sometimes ventures to prophesy evil in his own name! I trust it may fare with the gentleman in the course of his prophetic pilgrimages as it fared with the prophet of old when he ascended the mountain for the purpose of cursing God's Israel, and on his way was met by the angel, beautiful and immortal, guardian of men and nations, when, lifting his eyes, he saw the plains white with the tents of the chosen, the rescued, the redeemed, and the protected people, was compelled, instead of cursing, to utter blessings and exclaim, "How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob, and thy tabernacles, O Israel!"

Let the House do its duty. Let this Congress restore the disorganized States and bring them back to equal representation in the Congress of a common country. Let it go out all over the world that our feuds are ended, that we are again one united people, having at last but one country, one Constitution, and one destiny; and the whole earth will clap its hands with joy that the Republic, the last refuge of afflicted humanity upon earth, still lives, and by the blood of its patriot martyrs is redeemed, regenerated, and immortal among the nations.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] to amend the Senate amendments by striking out "Florida" wherever it occurs.

Mr. BROOKS. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 45, nays 99, not voting 45; as follows:

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on concurring in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the amendments of the Senate be laid on the table; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 23, nays 110, not voting 51; as follows:

* YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Axtell, Beck, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Eldridge, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Holman, Hotchkiss, Knott, Marshall, McCormick, McCullough, Morrissey, Niblack, Nicholson, Phelps, Robinson, Stone, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auker, Van Trump, and Woodward—23.

So the amendments of the Senate were not laid upon the table.

During the vote,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, stated that Mr. HUNTER, who would vote in the negative, was paired with Mr. HAIGHT, who would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. NIBLACK stated that Mr. KERR, who was absent by leave of the House, would vote against the bill in all its forms.

The reading of the bill, by unanimous consent, was dispensed with.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The question recurred on concurrence in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. BOYER demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 111, nays 23, not voting 50; as follows:

So the amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

During the vote,

Mr. NIBLACK stated that on this vote Mr. KERR was paired with Mr. ORTH.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, stated that his colleague, Mr. JONES, was paired with Mr. VAN HORN, of New York.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTORS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, moved that Senate bill No. 307, for the relief of certain Government contractors, be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill was taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. BROOMALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SURVEY OF INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

Mr. BUTLER. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back Senate bill No. 170, to provide for deficiency of expenses incurred in the survey of Indian reservations, with the recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. BUTLER. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Speaker, I know how hard it is to resist any report that may be made by any committee of this House, especially the Committee on Appropriations. This is a bill covering certain deficiencies for surveys of public lands. It happens to be my fortune to have a constituent who is interested in this bill, and therefore I feel it my duty to resist the report of this committee, at least so far as my constituent is concerned. The bill chiefly relates to the payment of money to persons who have surveyed Indian lands. The portion which I desire to refer to relates to the survey of the Cherokee lands and Osage trust lands, as I believe they are called.

The House is familiar with the circumstances under which these surveys were made. They were made under authority of two distinct treaties made in 1866 between the Osage and the Cherokee Indians and the United States. I do not know whether it is necessary for me to refer to those treaties. I will only state that the Secretary of the Interior in one case and the Commissioner of the General Land Office in the other case were directed to have the lands surveyed and the proceeds of the sales paid into the Treasury of the United States, a portion being first applied to reimburse the United States for the necessary expenses of surveying these lands. About the time of the ratification of the treaty Congress, in an appropriation bill, appropriated $50,000 to pay in part the expenses of those surveys. My constituent made these contracts in 1860, and under that appropriation received on his contract $15,000. There is now due to him about eighteen thousand dollars. I have the account here, adjusted by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Now, it has been claimed by some that these treaties were fraudulent, and by others that there was no authority of law for them. All that may be true, yet I claim that when the Government of the United States authorized by contract certain work to be done, and an honest man undertakes to perform that service, good faith to him requires he should receive compensation. This work was done in the fall of 1866 and summer of 1867. It was done in precise accordance with the law which fixed a price for this service, only the Commissioner of the General Land Office let the work at one dollar less per mile, I believe, than the law authorized.

Now, I do not desire to go into the question of these treaties made between the Government of the United States and the Cherokees and Osages. I only desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that here is a man who has performed honest labor under a contract made with the proper officers of the Government, and under and by virtue of a treaty made and ratified by the Senate of the United States. I believe it is unjust to him to keep from him this money which he has honestly earned. The money necessary to pay for this service is to-day in the Treasury of the United States, but by a mere formality the Comptroller refuses to pay the amount due, because he says it is necessary that Congress should make the appropriation.

So far as the Osage lands are concerned, it is well known to members of the House that they were settled up as rapidly as they could be surveyed. There was an absolute necessity for these surveys, because immigrants were going in by the hundred and thousand for the purpose of occupying the lands, and many of them are now taken up.

This bill contains appropriations to the amount of some seventy-nine thousand dollars. I do not know anything in relation to any other claim except that which affects my own constituent. I have before me all the papers. They convince me that he is entitled to receive his pay, amounting to some eighteen thousand dollars. What I desire the gentleman who reports this bill to do, and what I desire the House to do, is to have this bill recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations in order that they may report it back, allowing men who have honestly performed labor to receive the compensation to which they are entitled, especially when it does not really take any money out of the Treasury, but only takes from it money that is there held for the purpose of reimbursing men who have performed this work.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Was this work performed under a contract made by the United States?

Mr. ALLISON. The work was performed under contracts made with the then Secretary of the Interior, Mr. HARLAN, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office. What I desire to impress on the House is the fact that this work was honestly and faithfully performed, that the Government has received the benefit of it, and that the Government in this regard is a mere trustee for this fund, which goes into the Treasury of the United States from the proceeds of the sale of the lands.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman tell us what authority the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office had to contract for surveying these lands?

Mr. ALLISON. They had authority under the treaties made with the Osage Indians and the Cherokee Indians.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does not the gentleman know that this House solemnly decided, the other day, that those treaties were wholly nugatory, and conferred no sort of right, power, or authority on anybody?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know precisely what the effect of the decision of the House was.

Mr. MAYNARD. I made this same proposition here the other day and argued it before the House with whatsoever of ability I was able, and I will ask the gentleman how he stood on that question.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know what particular decision my friend refers to, but I want to ask him a question. Here is a surveyor who, under a contract made with the proper officers of the United States, has expended money and performed labor. I ask him if, as a member of this House, he is willing to allow this man to go without receiving his just compensation, and especially when the money does not come out of the Treasury of the United States, but out of the proceeds of the sales of the very lands which he surveyed.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will answer the question very cheerfully. I believe that the treaties to which he alludes are valid and binding obligations upon the Government, and that all the rights and duties imposed and conferred by that treaty are as of high a character as any that we have. I so believed, and so argued the other day when speaking in behalf of the rights of the Indians under the treaties. But the House decided the other way, and what I wish to know is how the gentleman is going to get over that decision?

Mr. BLAINE. By the vote of a majority. Mr. ALLISON. That is the very thing I am trying to get over, and I want a vote of the majority of the House recognizing the fact that this work has been performed and paying the man who performed it his honest and just dues.

Mr. BUTLER resumed the floor.

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman allow me few minutes?

Mr. BUTLER. I will yield to the gentleman for five minutes.

Mr. PRICE. I do not know that I shall want five minutes. I merely want to say to the House what I understand to be the facts of the case, and if I understand them properly there certainly ought not to be any hesitation in reference to the action of the House upon it.

A citizen of my State was sent for by the Commissioner of the General Land Office to come to Washington and receive certain orders. He came here, and the Commissioner directed him to go and make a survey of the Osage lands. He knew nothing about the treaty, nor was it any part of his business to know anything about it—whether it was right or wrong. He was acting under the directions of the officers of the Government. He was given to understand when he took this contract that the pay for the work was to come out of the proceeds of the sale of the lands after they were surveyed. With that understanding he proceeded to the field, and by the direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office he put four parties in the field. Why? Because it is alleged, and nobody denies that, that the lands are needed, that settlers are waiting to go upon them, that they are so anxious to settle these lands that they go upon them without their being surveyed, and the fact is that the settlers were waiting and did take up these lands as fast as they were surveyed. Now, what could any citizen of the Republic do under circumstances of that kind? What would any member of this House do under circumstances of that kind if he were a surveyor and without work and could get a fair price? I ask any gentleman whether he would not have taken the contract when it was offered to him by the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of the General Land Office with the express understanding that no pay was to come to him until the lands he surveyed should be settled and the money paid into the Treasury of the United States, and then he might expect his pay from it?

Now, under these circumstances, and with this state of facts existing, this gentleman took this contract, by direction of the officers of the Government, put four parties into the field, and performed the survey. The lands have been sold and paid for, the very land he surveyed; the money has been paid into the Treasury and is there to-day. Now, I would like the gentleman who reported this bill from the committee to tell me who is to get that money? And when we talk so much here about the rights of the citizen, which ought to be guarded in all civilized countries, I want to know what higher right a citizen of this Republic has than the right to receive from the Government the just compensation promised him, after he has complied with the conditions placed upon him? That money lies to-day in the Treasury of the United States, and it has been especially appropriated to pay for the lands which have been surveyed, and without surveying which—I wish gentlemen to remember that fact—there would not have been one dollar of this money in the Treasury. Can there be a fairer statement of the case than this? Can there be a more equitable claim upon the Government than this claim? If these are not the facts, if this is not the state of the case, then I have misunderstood the case entirely. But if these are the facts, if this is the state of the case, then I undertake to say that no gentleman who understands the case can refuse to acknowledge the justice of the claim, because in his individual capacity he would not for a moment dream of doing so. It is the due of a citizen of this Government, who has performed the duties imposed upon him, and now only asks that he may receive his fair compensation agreed upon.

Mr. BUTLER. If this case was as stated by either of the gentlemen from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON and Mr. PRICE,] I would agree that this House ought to pay this man. But there is a different way of stating the case. By treaty with the Osage Indians $20,000 was to be appropriated for the survey of their lands. By the treaty with the Creeks a certain other amount was appropriated, which I do not now remember. In the following year the Government of the United States appropriated [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] not a bit; and there is no

$50,000 for these surveys, which my friend [Mr. ALLISON] has omitted from his statement. Of that $50,000; $15,000 has already gone into the pocket of his client. By the treaty only $20,000 is to be used for this purpose.

Mr. ALLISON. Not my client; my constituent.

Mr. BUTLER. Constituent of the gentleman. I beg his pardon; it was a slip of the tongue entirely from the force of habit.

Now, let us see what is the proposition here. That we appropriate $78,000 to pay for surveys; and it is put upon the ground that these surveys have been made. I will not go into the question whether they have or have not been made. All I wish to present to this House is this: that there is no authority of law for making these surveys, and that the appropriation, either by treaty or otherwise, has been expended, and was expended long before this work was done; and, with the agreement in one treaty for $20,000, and an appropriation toward these surveys of $50,000, Congress went just as far as it is bound to go and fixed a limit. And the question with the House to-day is, whether any Indian commissioner or any Secretary of the Interior, disregarding the appropriations and the laws of the United States, can authorize any work to be done that he chooses to have done, or any expenditure to be made that he chooses to have made, and then have the men with whom he made that contract or agreement, without having the right to make it, come here and say: "We did the work; we are honest; pay us."

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. I differ with the gentleman who reported this bill, [Mr. BUTLER,] either through mistake or otherwise, in regard to the statement he now makes. He says this was made the limit. Now, I do not think there was any limit at all. There was no such thing specified in the treaty or appropriation or law as a limit beyond which they should not go. This appropriation was not at all dissimilar to appropriations of like character which have been made ever since this Government has owned public lands, appropriations very much more extravagant in their character. This is nothing more than an ordinary deficiency. Where is the limit? The treaty specified an appropriation, but never said that this much should be appropriated and no more. There is no such clause either express or implied.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, let us see about the limits:

"The Osage Indians having no annuities which would enable them to pay anything to carry this treaty into effect, it is agreed that the United States shall appropriate the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of defraying the expense of the survey and sale of the lands hereby ceded."

There is the limit.

Mr. BLAINE. But the point my friend makes is not the point in question. The clause of the treaty under which this survey was made is not the one which the gentleman has read, but it is this:

"The lands herein ceded shall be surveyed as the public lands of the United States are surveyed under the direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and shall be appraised by two disinterested persons, one to be designated by the Cherokee national council, and one by the Secretary of the Interior, and, in case of disagreement, by a third person to be mutually selected by the aforesaid appraisers; the appraisement to be not less than an average of one dollar and a quarter per acre exclusive of improvements."

Under that treaty obligation this work was done. There was no limitation of the treaty obligation. The job was to be done; and the fair implication is that whatever was necessary to do it the Congress of the United States was bound to appropriate.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, then, to resume what I was saying. Part of this claim is under the Osage treaty, the provision of which I have read, and part under the Cherokee treaty. The Congress of the United States has appropriated so much as it thought proper to carry out the provisions of those treaties, and it is bound to appropriate no more. What is the ground on which this appropriation is claimed? Are gentlemen unwilling to leave the Congress of the United States untrammelled in the matter of appropriations? We have appropriated in the general bill all that was thought proper for surveys of the public lands each year. But how is it attempted to compel the United States to make appropriations which they have not deemed it proper to authorize? When we have appropriated $50,000, the Secretary of the Interior not only expends that $50,000, but makes contracts involving an expenditure of $78,000 more; and then he comes in here through the men who have done the work or their representatives, and says, "You must pay this, because the work has been done;" and although there is no authority of law for this expenditure, although Congress in its judgment decided not to expend any more, yet we are forced into the improper position of seeming to reject a claim for labor actually done, or else paying just as much as the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or the Secretary of the Interior may without authority have contracted to pay.

This bill has received two examinations at the hands of the Committee on Appropriations. After I was at first directed to report the bill, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] made his statement to me, and I put his case before the committee, when, by the unanimous judgment of all the members present, I was authorized to report the bill with a recommendation that it do not pass. It is time that we should understand whether Congress is to control this matter of appropriations. What is the use of this Congress, under its constitutional authority, determining each year how much money shall be spent if the head of each Department may, as is now claimed, run the country in debt just as much as he pleases and then force through an appropriation to meet such indebtedness upon the ground that somebody has done—what? "In good faith done the work." Sir, the laws are open to all; and it is the duty of every man making these contracts or carrying them out to see just how much money has been appropriated for the particular work. The constituent of my friend from Iowa should have stopped when the appropriation was exhausted. That was his duty; and it was the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to have authorized no work beyond the point to which an appropriation had been made.

Mr. PRICE. I wish to ask my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] a question. Does he not concede that this work has been honestly and fairly done; and if so, is not the party who has in good faith performed it entitled to compensation therefor? If we can this morning, in less than two and a half minutes by the clock, vote away what cost the Government thousands of dollars as an act of generosity, I ask the gentlemen whether we ought not to be sufficiently just to pay a man for labor performed, who has faithfully and honestly complied with his engagement with the Government? It is all in a nutshell; and the answer to this question will settle the case.

Mr. BUTLER. I will endeavor to answer the three questions which the gentleman has put to me, although not in the order in which he has put them. First, he asks whether a man who honestly and justly performs work for the Government is entitled to his pay? Yes, always. Second, whether we can vote away $2,500,000, more or less, in two and a half minutes? Is it to pay our honest debts? If so, I say yes; but whether we can or not we ought to pay our debts in any event. The other question is, was not this work honestly and faithfully done? On that I am not instructed, but I am instructed that it was not honestly and faithfully done under the law; because it was done in violation of the law; and the law is known of all men, especially of surveyors and Indian agents and all that class of men, for they study the law with great diligence to see how they may evade it.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not think I can; I promised not to.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. BUTLER. For a moment.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to make a statement. The gentleman from Massachusetts says, so far as this particular claim is concerned, it was in violation of law. I wish to call his attention to facts and dates. The appropriation of $50,000, of which he speaks, passed Congress on the 28th of July, 1866. This contract with my constituent was on the 15th day of August, 1866, to survey the Cherokee lands and not the Osage lands; and under the Cherokee treaty it is made the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to survey those lands. Therefore I say, so far as the survey relating to the Cherokee lands is concerned, it was made by the Secretary of the Interior in pursuance of the treaty with the Cherokees. And if there is any treaty which can be made with the Indians which is binding upon Congress or the country it is this treaty of 1866. Gentlemen may say that treaty was not ratified. It was ratified and finally signed by the parties on the 11th of August, 1866, several days before this contract was made. I have the certificate of the Commissioner of the General Land Office that this work was faithfully and honestly performed; and I can see no reason why, in justice, equity, and law, this man should not have the reward of his honest toil.

Mr. BUTLER. I am content that he shall have the reward of his honest toil, but I ask him to come to this House, as every other man who has a claim against this Government—to come through the Committee of Claims of this House, and not through the Indian Bureau. I wish him to come and say, "I have a claim for which there was no provision of law, and for which there was no appropriation by law; and, having such a claim, I desire to be recognized, because I believe it is just and honest." My constituents have to come here when they have just claims against the Government. They have to go before the Committee of Claims of this House. But, sir, these surveys of these Indian lands, and all such matters are attempted to be put through here under the claim that they are a deficiency. There was no deficiency of appropriation. It was a willful, direct, intentional violation of the law, and known to be so at the time; and the man who did the work and the Commissioner took the risk of getting an appropriation through Congress, as it had been the custom to do before. When it is said this is here, as a matter of right, to that I answer, you have no right because you had no authority of law.

Now, then, I will deal with this Cherokee matter. It is a survey of a part of the neutral land, that land for which the Connecticut Emigration Company has paid $800,000; and while we were discussing the subject in this House the treaty was put through the Senate, a treaty by which land worth $4,000,000, as I am informed, was sold for $800,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. And ratified?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir; ratified while we were talking about it, while we were calling the attention of the nation to it.

Mr. MAYNARD. Whose lands were they?

Mr. BUTLER. I have no difficulty about that. They were lands belonging to the Cherokee Indians, and they were conveyed with a condition in the title that they never should be sold except by the consent of the United States; and that consent, in my judgment, cannot be given by the Senate of the United States. For what is to be the effect? The Senate have undertaken to ignore the rest of the Government of the United States in this matter by what they call a treaty made up here in the Indian Bureau, taking some eight or nine thousand dollars to pay the expenses of the Indians, while they were here, to feed and feast them and get them drunk until they made it.

Mr. MAYNARD. By virtue of what arrangement did the Cherokees procure the title to this land. Was it not by treaty?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir; there is no difficulty about that. I admit the title perfectly; but it was covered with this condition: that the United States should have the right to sell. Now, then, what is the effect of selling it?

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask the gentleman whether the assent of the United States was not to be given precisely in the same way that the United States originally gave title to the land—that is, by treaty?

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir; not at all. It was put in without the consent of the United States. Now, what is the effect of that? Why, that the land is sold for $800,000, and as soon as that is eaten up and drank up by the Indians they come upon the United States for an appropriation of money to take care of them, while $3,000,000 of their property has gone into the hands of speculators. In the meantime this Osage tract is being surveyed for what purpose? Why, to get through a treaty which is now before the Senate. I believe it was ratified; I do not know; but it was lately before the Senate for eight million acres, at twenty cents an acre, payable in fifteen years.

A MEMBER. Yes, sir; nine millions.

Mr. BUTLER. I keep within bounds. Now, then, I say we are asked to appropriate money for a deficiency for what? To meet these surveys, so that the lands settled may be surveyed at the expense of the United States, and the men who bought these lands by that treaty may get possession of them. I had not intended to go into this matter, but when gentlemen come here and claim such good faith in this matter I want to show this House and the country how impossible it is for us to limit the expenditure of this country if we cannot say how much shall be expended or how much shall be used by officers of the Government; up to this time I say it is quite impossible, because this is the way it is done. While my friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] will go with me in cutting down Indian appropriations, yet when it comes to a deficiency bill, when he is appealed to, as he is in this case, by his constituent, who has done work, then he feels it his duty—and I do not mean to say improperly at all—to come and advocate the cause of that constituent in this House. By such means we get the appropriations raised day by day. The power which gives control to this House over the expenditures of the country becomes practically useless.

Why, sir, do not gentlemen know that you cannot get any public work done of any description within the amount appropriated? It is not possible to do it, because both the contractor and contractee often have an interest in it, and they say, "We will begin upon it and we will run up the appropriation; we will add so much more, and then we will come in and ask the additional sum to be made up in a deficiency bill."

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman has stated again to-day, as on one or two previous occasions, that this tract of land was granted to the Indians on the condition that they should never sell it without the consent of the United States. His usual accuracy in such matters led me to suppose that he must necessarily be correct in this statement. I have examined the treaty; it is before me.

Mr. BUTLER. Of what year?

Mr. MAYNARD. Of 1835. It provides that the land shall be conveyed in fee simple to the Indians and their descendants, but I have not been able to find the provision to which he refers. I shall be glad if he will cite that part so that I may examine it.

Mr. BUTLER. I had the citation on my brief when the matter came up before. You will find it is provided for. I cannot at this moment turn to the page. But the very fact that the Senate have just ratified a new treaty giving that consent is strong if not conclusive evidence of the fact that there is such a provision.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish the gentleman would turn to it.

Mr. BUTLER. I will turn to it when I get through and satisfy the gentleman. I say that upon this matter the whole question is now to be determined whether we are to hold our control over the expenditures of the Government or not. If this gentleman has got a claim for fifteen or eighteen thousand dollars, let him go to the Committee of Claims, and if he shows a just one I will vote for it; but my proposition is that you shall not force through an appropriation of $78,000 by the Senate on the pretense of paying an honest man $18,000 out of it.

Again, sir, I want another principle tested just here, and I would not take up the time of the House if it were not a very important matter. I want it understood whether the Senate of the United States, and the President of the United States, can control the expenditures of this Government, without the consent of this House, by treaties? If they can, there is an end to this Government in the form in which it was first launched by our fathers. If they can properly, as it is claimed, appropriate $20,000 under the Osage treaty they can appropriate $2,000,000; if they can appropriate $2,000,000, then they can appropriate $7,500,000 for Alaska; if they can appropriate $7,500,000 for Alaska, they can appropriate $7,500,000 for St. Thomas; and if they can appropriate $7,500,000 for St. Thomas, they can appropriate $1,000,000,000 for Mexico.

Mr. HIGBY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER. I will yield for a question simply.

Mr. HIGBY. I would ask the gentleman if the Committee on Appropriations have not been asking Congress to appropriate money under treaties made with Indians all through this session, and if they do not do it every session of Congress—treaties made by the Executive and sanctioned by the Senate without regard to the House?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly we have, and so much the worse for us. I agree that we have, and we have felt ourselves obliged to do it. But that is another question. The question here is whether the Senate can say we shall appropriate so much money. I say no, and the moment this House gives up its control over this matter we might as well give up all control over the expenditures, because by a reciprocity treaty with any nation the Senate can control all our revenues and by another treaty they can control all our expenditures and this House becomes substantially useless as the constitutional keeper of the taxes of the people.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman tell me how it is possible for the nation to make contracts with another nation?

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir; I will not go into that.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will he tell me if he thinks it possible for us to deal in this way with the powerful nations of the earth without involving ourselves at once in war and international complications?

Mr. BUTLER. When we get to be so poor and so weak as to have, in dealing with the other nations of the world, to pay tribute to them by treaty to keep them good-natured, then I am for fighting. But I deny that we are under obligations to any nation on the earth to make any treaty to pay money, and it is wholly against the theory of this Government that we should be making treaties to pay money. We have been making treaties with the Indians to do what? To take care of them and to buy their lands; and a more iniquitous system never was heard of. I yield now to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE.]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I only desire a moment to state to the House the views by which I was governed in regard to this bill. The bill is sent to us from the Senate with an appropriation of $78,000, which, it is alleged, is a deficiency under existing laws, for which Congress is obliged to appropriate money. We find that it is no deficiency. We find that the Secretary of the Interior, without authority of law, for some purpose, probably a good one, known to himself, made a contract with a party from Iowa with regard to the survey of lands. It was done without authority of law, and it was his business to know that when he made the contract. The bill when it came from the Senate was sent to the Committee on Appropriations. The Committee found there was no law authorizing this appropriation to be made, and they directed this report to be made, as I supposed, unanimously. I did not suppose the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] was opposed to it, but I understand now that he was.

Mr. SPALDING. Yes; and there is another member of the committee here who knew nothing about it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. There was a majority of the committee, and there was no objection to the report made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] that there was no authority of law for this. The question is, is the House to pass upon this question in this way? This is nothing but a private claim. If this man has done the work let him go with his account before the Committee of Claims; let him introduce his testimony there, and let that committee report upon the claim. But to come in here under the guise of a deficiency, when there is no deficiency, and undertake to load down our appropriation bill with $78,000, I say is an outrage. I ask gentlemen where they expect to land if they go on with appropriations day after day in this way, if the Committee on Appropriations are to be overruled in this way, and if every effort for economy which we make is to be nullified by the House?

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to ask the gentleman if it is not the fact that this money is now in the Treasury, as proceeds of the sales of these identical lands so surveyed? And before the gentleman answers that question, I wish to say that I know nothing about any portion of this bill, except the amount I have spoken of; and I knew nothing of that until a few days ago, when this man came to my room and explained his case fully to me.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I know nothing about these parties. It seems that not only one but more are interested in this case. And because my friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] has a constituent interested in it, he comes in here and asks us to appropriate $78,000 in this bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not ask any such thing. I only ask that this bill shall be recommended to the Committee on Appropriations, and that they shall examine the case.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Very well. Then I will suggest to my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. BUTLER] to let this bill take that course; to let it go back to the Committee on Appropriations, and let us have a thorough sifting of this whole matter in connection with this extraordinary treaty concerning the Osage and Cherokee lands. And let the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom the message of the President upon the subject was referred yesterday, with power to send for persons and papers, let them examine the whole question, and let us get to the bottom of it.

Mr. BLAINE. That is all that has been asked.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Very well; let us get to the bottom of it.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] a question.

Mr. BUTLER. Very well.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] to say that the Secretary of the Interior ordered this additional expense from honest and correct motives. Now, from the debate all around me, I had been led to suppose that the Secretary of the Interior had ordered this expenditure in order to get this land surveyed ready for the treaty which these speculators have had made. Now, if that inference from that debate is incorrect, and the Secretary of the Interior ordered this survey from correct motives, I would like to know it.

Mr. BUTLER. As we are to open up this whole subject—and it is very necessary to open it up, as two members of the Committee on Appropriations have said that they were not present when this matter was passed upon by the committee—I am quite ready to agree with my colleague on the committee, [Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois,] and let this bill be recommended.

Mr. BLAINE. That is right.

Mr. BUTLER. For the purpose of enabling me, when this matter comes up again, to answer every question the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] and every other gentleman may ask me—and let the right prevail, for I want to have this thing thoroughly ventilated—I move that this bill be recommended to the Committee on Appropriations; and upon that motion I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof, the motion to recommit was agreed to.

INDIAN COMMISSION APPROPRIATION.

Mr. BUTLER. I have also been instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report another bill, which I ask to have considered at this time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to reserve the point of order, that, being an appropriation bill, it must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope the gentleman will reserve his point of order until I can make a statement in regard to the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will do so.

The bill (H. R. No. 1218) appropriating money to sustain the Indian commission, and to carry out treaties made thereby, was then read a first and second time.

Mr. BUTLER. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] insists upon his point of order, of course this bill must first be considered in Committee of the Whole. But I desire to make a statement to show that the present condition of the public business requires that this bill should be passed at once.

This bill proposes to appropriate $150,000 to aid the Indian peace commission, to defray their expenses, and to meet the obligations of the treaties which they are now making with certain Indians, among which are the Navajoes, whom they have been able to have removed. I report this bill in response to a desire expressed by General Sherman and the peace commission, who have sent a special messenger here to say that many hundreds of thousands of dollars can be saved to this Government by making a small appropriation to carry out the arrangements that they are now making with the western Indians to prevent a war. In order to give them the means to carry out such an arrangement the Committee on Appropriations have directed me to report this bill. This money is to be expended only to carry out the operations of the Indian commission who are now dealing with the Indians on the Plains.

If the gentleman from Indiana is not satisfied with this explanation, then this bill must go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think this bill had better go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I move that this bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask consent of the House that this bill be made the special order in Committee of the Whole for Monday next.

Mr. SCHENCK. I object to that. I am willing that it should be made the special order after the tax bill has been acted upon in committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman can move on Monday next to suspend the rules for the purpose of making this bill a special order.

The SPEAKER. There is one motion to suspend the rules now pending, submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT,] which will come up on Monday next the first thing after the morning hour.

Mr. BUTLER. I give notice that on Monday next I will move to suspend the rules, in order that this bill may be then considered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is now after three o'clock. I ask unanimous consent that the morning hour for to-day may be dispensed with.

Mr. BENJAMIN and others objected.

Mr. SCHENCK. Cannot the morning hour be dispensed with by a majority vote?

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent. The private business may be set aside by a majority vote; but should that be done, then the order would be the call of committees for reports of a public nature.

ORDER FOR AN EVENING SESSION.

Mr. SCHENCK. As the morning hour must go on, we can hardly get into Committee of the Whole on the tax bill before half past four o'clock. I will therefore move that there be an evening session this evening at half past seven o'clock, for the consideration of the internal tax bill in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANDALL. Is it to be with the understanding that no business is to be transacted this evening except the consideration of the tax bill in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. I must object to an evening session, unless such an arrangement can be made.

The SPEAKER. The motion is that the House shall meet at half past seven o'clock this evening in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the tax bill. Such an order can be made by a majority vote. There probably will be no other business transacted, as there is usually no quorum present at an evening session when the House comes out of Committee of the Whole. And any member can then call for a division upon any question, and if no quorum is present no business can be done.

The motion of Mr. SCHENCK for an evening session was then agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now commenced. This being private bill day, the first business in order is the call of committees for reports of a private nature, commencing with the Committee on Invalid Pensions, where the call rested on Saturday last.

MICHAEL HENNESSEY.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is upon Senate bill No. 280, for the relief of Michael Hennessey, of Platte county, Missouri, which was reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions on Saturday last, by the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. POLSLEY,] and was pending when the morning hour expired. The bill has been amended, and the question is upon the third reading of the bill. The bill was then read the third time, and passed.

Mr. POLSLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

KATE HIGGINS.

Mr. BURR, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1220) granting a pension to Kate Higgins, of Louisville, Kentucky; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Kate Higgins, of Louisville, Kentucky, the widow of John Higgins, formerly a private in company F, twenty-eighth regiment of Kentucky infantry, to receive a pension as such widow, commencing November 11, 1865.

Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire. I ask that the bill be reported.

Mr. BURR. I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. WOODWARD. It relates to common carriers in the southern States.

Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire. I do not object.

The bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret Filson, widow of George W. Filson, late a private of company K, ninety-seventh regiment Indiana volunteers, to receive a pension, to bear date from the 1st of January, 1866.

Wallace, for a pension at the rate of fifty dollars per month from the 10th of April, 1862. It further provides that the pension heretofore allowed to the said widow under the general law be discontinued.

Mr. HOLMAN. I see this pension is fifty dollars a month. It makes an exception. There ought to be some uniform rule on the subject. The general law allows only thirty dollars a month.

Mr. COOK. If the gentleman will examine he will find it to be the fact that in every case where a brigadier general has been killed on the battle-field, as was General Wallace, the pension granted by special law to the widow has been fifty dollars a month. There are five such cases, and this is the last one that can be affected by this rule. I have made the examination, and I understand that to be the fact.

Mr. HOLMAN. All I wanted was to be informed of that fact. I have no objection. I will inquire if the name of Brigadier General P. A. Hackleman is included in any of these acts.

Mr. BURR. It does not appear on this list.

Mr. COOK. I cannot tell the names of all, but I know the names of five.

Mr. HOLMAN. I give notice that I will introduce a bill covering that case.

ORDER OF BUSINESS TO-MORROW.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, it is now so late that I do not propose to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the special order. I hope, however, that members generally will be in attendance to-night, so as to give us a quorum, that we may proceed with the tax bill. I have also a proposition to make. It is that the House agree to meet to-morrow at eleven o'clock a. m., and sit till five o'clock p. m., dispensing with the evening session. I ask the House to give us one good solid day.

Mr. GOLLADAY. I object.

Mr. SCHENCK. I propose, then, that we meet at eleven o'clock to-morrow to go into Committee of the Whole on the tax bill immediately after the morning hour and to continue in session till five o'clock, dispensing with the evening session.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

AMERICAN SHARPSHOOTERS.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means a joint resolution (H. R. No. 295) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to remit the duties on certain articles contributed to the National Association of American Sharpshooters; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I think a brief explanation will satisfy the House of the propriety of passing this resolution, which the committee unanimously directed me to report. This Association of American Sharpshooters is an association of delegates from all the German societies, who are in a short time to hold a grand festival in the city of New York, continuing four weeks, to which festival they have, I believe, invited Congress; and, as I just learn, (for I was not present at the time,) the House, in response to that invitation, has appointed a committee. Individuals in Germany, as well as associations there of a similar character, have agreed to contribute a number of medals, &c., to be among the prizes shot for. We are asked to provide that these articles, to an amount not exceeding $10,000 in currency, may come in free of duty; and the Committee of Ways and Means are unanimously in favor of the measure.

Mr. ROBINSON. I trust that this resolution will be passed without opposition on either side.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1058) to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida to representation in Congress.

SALE OF DAMAGED ARMS, ETC.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Military Affairs a joint resolution (H. R. No. 292) directing the Secretary of War to sell damaged or unserviceable arms, ordnance, and ordnance stores. This is a measure of very considerable importance to the Treasury, and I trust there will be no objection to allowing it to be reported now.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I object.

Mr. SCHENCK. In order to encourage gentlemen to come here this evening I move that the House now take its recess.

The motion was agreed to; and the House (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) took a recess till half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

At half past seven o'clock the House reassembled in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes.

THE CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will continue the reading of the bill where he left off yesterday.

The Clerk read as follows:

Power of attorney for the sale or transfer of any stock, bonds, or scrip, or for the collection of any dividends or interest thereon, twenty-five cents.

No amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Power of attorney or proxy for voting at any election for officers of any incorporated company or society, except religious, charitable, or literary societies, or public cemeteries, ten cents.

Mr. BARNES. I move to strike that paragraph out of the bill. This proposes to bring in a very small revenue and is obtained at great inconvenience. This issuing of proxies at any election can only be done immediately before the election. The shareholders of a stock company are distributed in the different sections of the country. Many of them are unacquainted with the character of the stamp the law requires, and when the shareholders meet for an election this is the cause of a very great deal of confusion. I submit to the Committee of Ways and Means whether it is necessary to continue the stamp tax upon these proxies.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to oppose the amendment, and I hope that it will not prevail.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

No further amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Power of attorney to receive or collect rent, twenty-five cents.

No amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Power of attorney to sell and convey real estate, or to rent or lease the same, one dollar.

No amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Power of attorney for any other purpose, fifty cents.

No amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Probate of will, or letters of administration: Where the estate and effects for or in respect of which such probate or letters of administration applied for shall be sworn or declared not to exceed the value of $2,000, one dollar. Exceeding $2,000, for every additional $1,000 or fractional part thereof, in excess of $2,000, fifty cents: Provided, That no stamp, either for probate of wills, or letters testamentary, or of administration, or on administrator or guardian bond, shall be required when the value of the estate and effects, real and personal, does not exceed $1,000: Provided, further, That no stamp tax shall be required upon any papers necessary to be used for the collection from the Government of claims by soldiers or their legal representatives of the United States, for pensions, back pay, bounty, or for property lost in the service.

No amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Protest. Upon the protest of every note, bill of exchange, acceptance, check, or draft, or any marine protest, whether protested by a notary public or by any other officer who may be authorized by the laws of any State or States to make such protest, twenty-five cents.

No amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Receipts for any sum exceeding twenty dollars in amount, not being for the satisfaction of any mortgage or judgment, or decree of any court, or by indorsement on any stamped obligation in acknowledgment of its fulfillment, for each receipt, two cents: but when more than one signature is affixed to the same paper, one or more stamps may be affixed thereto, representing the whole amount required for such signatures.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to strike out "twenty dollars" and in lieu thereof to insert "fifty dollars."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. I move to strike out the whole paragraph. I should like to see this tax dispensed with, for there is nothing more annoying than this two-cent tax. I do not know what revenue it brings in, but I do not think it can amount to much. There is no part of the stamp law that is so much found fault with as this two-cent stamp.

Mr. SCHENCK. We have amended the bill by saying that no tax shall be required on receipts for an amount under fifty dollars instead of twenty dollars. It is the stamps upon smaller receipts that cause annoyance.

Mr. MILLER. How much is received from stamps?

Mr. SCHENCK. Eighteen million dollars in the gross. It is $2,000,000 from these two-cent stamps.

Mr. MILLER. I withdraw the amendment. We must have revenue.

Mr. GETZ. I renew the amendment.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I move to strike out the latter portion of the paragraph after the words "two cents." The reason I do it is simply this. These receipts are made all over the country, and it makes no difference which the sum is, fifty dollars or five dollars, except that there are less at five dollars. But in the rural districts, where men give receipts, they cannot get the stamps without more expense than they are worth. There is no tax in the whole bill, from page one to page three hundred and sixty, that gives so much dissatisfaction as this two-cent tax. I had hoped that the chairman of the committee would himself have moved to strike out this paragraph and let it go. It will do more to satisfy the people than anything, and will save a great annoyance.

Mr. PAINE. The gentleman did not move to strike out the whole paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. That was moved and withdrawn.

Mr. PRICE. Then I modify my amendment so as to include the whole paragraph. I thought I had accomplished it. I do not wish to embarrass the bill nor to take up the time of the committee, but I do think the paragraph ought to be stricken out.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have to repeat what I have said before, that the committee have no more interest in this matter than the gentlemen themselves. Our only desire is to collect the revenue. All taxes are inconvenient and this among the rest. But we have endeavored to avoid a great source of inconvenience by raising, as gentlemen will see, the amount of receipt to fifty dollars, no stamp being required on any sum below that.

Mr. MILLER. I suggest to make the amount $100.

Mr. PRICE. No; strike it all out.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 103. And be it further enacted, That in any and all cases where an adhesive stamp shall be used for denoting the payment of any tax imposed by law, except as may be otherwise provided, the person making, delivering, or giving the instrument, matter, or thing to be taxed shall affix the stamp and cancel the same by writing thereon the initials of his name and the date upon which the same shall be affixed or used, so that the same may not again be used, or in such other manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may by general regulation prescribe.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to strike out the words "affix the stamp and cancel the same by writing thereon," and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

To affix the stamp or stamps denoting said tax that the entire surface thereof shall be exposed to view, and shall cancel the same by writing with ink upon each and every stamp so used.

Mr. PETERS. I move to amend by adding the words by inserting "in words or printing." It is very common to print.

Mr. BARNES. Stamping.

Mr. SCHENCK. The last clause of the section reads, "or in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may by general regulation prescribe." The report of the scientific commission says the surest way is to have the stamps made of gum and ink which will be erased when it is attempted to be washed out, and to have the canceling done in writing, and we have left it discretionary with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to allow it to be done by a machine, or in some other way.

Mr. PETERS. Most of the business houses do it by printing.

Mr. SCHENCK. Not always; the surest way is by ink.

Mr. PETERS. It is done by a machine.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is permitted, although the other is a regular way. The purpose for which we require the whole surface of the stamp to be visible is simply this: we find in Philadelphia, for instance, a man engaged in putting up patent medicine where he is required to put on a four-cent stamp. He takes two two-cent stamps, cuts them in two, and uses two halves, so as to show only the edges of them, making them look as if they were two whole stamps. Then he uses the other two halves on another package.

Mr. BARNES. I desire to ask a question. The phraseology of this section applies to instruments, while the remarks of the chairman of the committee apply to articles also.

Mr. SCHENCK. The language is "instrument, matter, or things." That will take in any other thing.

Mr. BARNES. I move to strike out the section for the purpose of offering a suggestion. It seems to me that where articles are multiplied as often as they are in some branches of business to which stamps are applicable, it would be a matter of impracticability—I might almost say an impossibility—to cancel the stamps in writing. It would require in some establishments in the country a large force of employes to do this kind of work. I presume that there are in Philadelphia, to which the gentleman has referred, establishments that could not cancel the stamps required by this law without the employment of fifty persons. This section gives power to the Commissioner to devise other means of cancellation, and it may be that he will not require it to be done in writing; but if he should, I do not see how it could be done. If I understand the present law this power exists with the Commissioner, and he decides that printing and stamping may be done.

Mr. GRISWOLD. The gentleman, I apprehend, does not understand this section. If he will look at the last two lines of the paragraph, he will see that it leaves the Commissioner at liberty to allow them to be canceled in some other way.

The question was taken on Mr. BARNES's amendment; and it was disagreed to.

The Clerk read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 104. And be it further enacted, That the acceptor of any bill of exchange or order for the payment of any sum of money drawn, or purporting to be drawn, in any foreign country, but payable in the United States, shall, before paying or accepting the same, place thereon a stamp for the proper amount of tax, and cancel the same, as the law requires for inland bills of exchange or promissory notes; and no bill of exchange shall be paid or negotiated without such stamp; and if any person shall pay or negotiate, or offer in payment, or receive, or take in payment any such draft or order, he shall be liable to a penalty of $200.

No amendment was offered; and the next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 105. And be it further enacted, That no stamp tax shall be required on official instruments, documents, and papers issued by the officers of the United States Government or of any State, county, town, or other municipal corporation, in the exercise of functions strictly belonging to them in their ordinary governmental and municipal capacity; nor on affidavits, nor on powers of attorney, or any other paper relating to applications for bounty, arrearages of pay, or pensions, or to the receipt thereof; nor on tickets or contracts of insurance when limited to accidental injury to persons, nor on certificates of the measurement or weight of animals, wood, coal, or hay; nor on deposit notes to mutual insurance companies, for insurance upon which policies subject to stamp taxes have been or are to be issued; nor on manifests, bills of lading, or passage tickets, by steamboats or vessels plying between ports of the United States and ports of British North America on the lakes or other inland waters dividing that country from the United States; nor on any certificate of the record of a deed or other instrument in writing, or of the acknowledgment or proof thereof by attesting witnesses, nor to any indorsement of a negotiable instrument, nor on any warranty of attorney accompanying a bond or note, when such bond or note shall have affixed thereto the stamp or stamps denoting the tax required; and whenever any bond or note shall be secured by a mortgage, but one stamp shall be required to be placed on such papers, but the stamp placed thereon shall be for the largest amount required for either of said instruments.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer, from the Committee of Ways and Means, the following amendment:

Page 154, section one hundred and five, at the end of line twenty, insert the following: "Nor on any duplicate or copy of any instrument in writing retained by the person making, delivering, or giving the same."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 106. And be it further enacted, That any person who, with intent to evade the tax thereon, shall make, sign, or issue, or cause to be made, signed, or issued, any instrument, document, or paper of any kind or description whatsoever, or accept, negotiate, or pay, or cause to be accepted, negotiated, or paid, any bill of exchange, draft, or order, or promissory note for the payment of money, without the same being duly stamped, and the stamp thereon canceled as required by law, shall, for every such offense, forfeit the sum of fifty dollars; and such instrument, document, or paper, bill, draft, order, or note, not being stamped according to law, shall be deemed invalid and of no effect: Provided, That the title of a purchaser of land by deed duly stamped shall not be defeated or affected by the want of a proper stamp on any deed conveying said land by any person, from, through, or under whom his grantor claims or holds title.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to amend that section by inserting before the word "any," on line fourteen, the words "contract or;" so that it shall read "or any contract or deed conveying said land," &c.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 107. And be it further enacted, That no instrument, document, or paper required by law to be stamped shall be admitted or used as evidence in any court, unless the proper stamp denoting the amount of tax payable thereon shall have been affixed thereto and canceled as required by law; nor shall it be lawful to record any such instrument, document, or paper unless a stamp of the proper amount is affixed thereto and canceled in the manner required by law; and the record of any such instrument, document, or paper not stamped as aforesaid shall not be admitted or used as evidence in any court. And any power of attorney, conveyance, or document of any kind, made in any foreign country to be used in the United States, shall pay the same tax as is required by law on similar instruments or documents when made or issued in the United States, and the person to whom the same is issued or by whom it is to be used shall, before using the same, affix thereon and cancel the proper stamp for the amount of tax required.

No amendment was offered.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 108. And be it further enacted, That in case any person shall not have affixed to any instrument the stamp required by law thereon at the time of making or issuing the said instrument, and he, or any other person having an interest therein, shall be desirous of affixing such stamp to said instrument, or if said instrument be lost, to a copy thereof, he, or such other person, shall appear before the collector of the proper district, who shall, upon the payment of the amount of the stamp required by law, and of a penalty of fifty dollars, and where the whole amount of the tax denoted by the stamp required shall exceed the sum of fifty dollars, on payment also of interest, at the rate of six per cent. on said tax from the day on which such stamp ought to have been affixed, affix the proper stamp to such instrument or copy and cancel the same, and note upon the margin thereof the date of his so doing, and the fact that such penalty has been paid; and the same shall thereupon be deemed and held to be as valid, to all intents and purposes, as if stamped when made or issued. But if it shall appear upon evidence satisfactory to said collector that any such instrument was not duly stamped at the time of making or issuing the same, by reason of accident, mistake, or inadvertence, and without any willful design to defraud the United States of the tax, or to evade or delay the payment thereof, then and in such case, if such instrument, or, if the original be lost, a copy thereof, duly certified by the officer having charge of any records in which such original is required to be recorded, or otherwise duly proven to the satisfaction of the collector, shall, within six months after the making or issuing thereof, be brought to the said collector of revenue to be stamped, and the stamp tax chargeable thereon paid, it shall be lawful for the said collector to remit the penalty aforesaid, and to affix and cancel the proper stamp upon such instrument. And when the original instrument, or a certified or duly proved copy thereof, as aforesaid, thus stamped so as to entitle the same to be recorded, shall be presented to the clerk, register, recorder, or other officer having charge of the original record it shall be lawful for such officer, upon the payment of the fee legally chargeable for the recording thereof, to make a new record thereof, or to note upon the original record the fact that the error or omission in the stamping of said original instrument has been corrected pursuant to law; and the original instrument, or such certified copy, or the record thereof, may be used in all courts and places in the same manner and with like effect as if the instrument had been originally stamped. In any case where it shall appear that the failure to affix the stamp required by law on any instrument at the time of making, signing, or issuing the same was occasioned by the fact that no collection district was then established at the place where such instrument was made, signed, or issued, and that the required stamp was afterward, and before the 1st day of January, 1869, duly affixed thereto, or to a copy thereof, and canceled according to the provisions of this section, the same shall be as valid to all intents and purposes as if stamped originally as required by law. But no right acquired in good faith before the stamping of any instrument or copy thereof, and the recording thereof, shall in any manner be affected by such subsequent stamping.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer the following amendment from the Committee of Ways and Means:

Page 156, line eight, after the word "shall" insert the words "under regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPALDING. I offer the following amendment:

Page 157, line fifty-one, after the word "issued," insert the words: "or when it shall appear that the proper stamp was omitted by reason of a commonly received construction of the act different from that finally, and after the lapse of six months from the date of the instrument, given to it by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, requiring a stamp."

I will explain the object of that amendment. Where the party executing the instrument does not at the time of its execution suppose that a stamp is necessary, and after the lapse of six months the Commissioner shall decide that a stamp is necessary, in such a case there is no possible place left where the evil can be corrected unless we have an amendment of this sort adopted. In cases that occur after six months have elapsed, where a party in good faith omits to put a stamp but is entirely willing to do it when he discovers his error and that the Commissioner requires a particular stamp, then I want that the party shall have an opportunity to do it. I suppose there will be no objection to the amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman refers, I presume, to cases where the party fails to put on a stamp through a misconception of the law?

Mr. SPALDING. Yes, sir. I will state a case that I know to have occurred. A friend of mine has issued land contracts and put on, perhaps, a twenty-five cent. stamp, and has discovered, after the lapse of six months, that the Commissioner requires, perhaps, a dollar stamp. He is willing to put it on, but he has not the power under the law, and the law, as it now exists, does not give the power. It is for a case like that that I propose this amendment. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue may not have made his decision until more than six months after the instrument is made. It is in reference to a case where the collector himself may not suppose that a stamp is required, or may suppose that a stamp of less value is required. But after the lapse of six months he finds, by a decision of the Commissioner, that a higher stamp is required. Such a case will not often occur, but when it does occur we ought to afford an opportunity to the party, who is really not in fault, to come in and affix a stamp.

Mr. SCHENCK. From comparison, I am satisfied there never was a stamp act before so liberal in its provisions for inadvertence, inexperience, and ignorance as this act is. And surely it will not do to keep it open in this vague manner forever. This has been in operation now for some time, and it has obtained a fixed construction and there is a settled practice under it. It appears to me that it would be a very uncertain matter to open this up in the exceedingly loose manner in which my colleague proposes.

Mr. SPALDING. I wish to provide a remedy and to rectify the practice as it now exists under the law. There is now no remedy.

Mr. MAYNARD. Why not extend the time for affixing the stamp for six months?

Mr. SPALDING. Anything that would relieve us from the difficulty; I do not care what it may be.

Mr. MULLINS. To my mind this whole matter is fully provided for in the following portion of this section:

But if it shall appear upon evidence satisfactory to said collector that any such instrument was not duly stamped at the time of making or issuing the same, by reason of accident, mistake, or inadvertence, and without any willful design to defraud the United States of the tax, or to evade or delay the payment thereof, then and in such case, if such instrument, or, if the original be lost, a copy thereof, duly certified by the officer having charge of any records in which such original is required to be recorded, or otherwise duly proved to the satisfaction of the collector, shall, within six months after the making or issuing thereof, be brought to the said collector of revenue to be stamped, and the stamp tax chargeable thereon paid, it shall be lawful for the said collector to remit the penalty aforesaid, and to affix and cancel the proper stamp upon such instrument.

That seems to me to be just as clear and conclusive as it possibly can be. If it be made more liberal than that it will run into perfect abuse. That is my judgment.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] to propose, in lieu of his amendment, an amendment to the paragraph just read by my colleague, [Mr. MULLINS,] extending the period there provided for from "six months" to "one year."

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection to that. It will give a man an entire year to find out whether he has put the right stamp on.

Mr. SPALDING. Make it two years.

Mr. SCHENCK. If my colleague will be satisfied with one year I will agree to it. That is twice as long as the law now allows.

Mr. SPALDING. Very well; I will modify my amendment as suggested by the gentleman.

The amendment, as modified, was then agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 109. And be it further enacted, That no instrument, document, writing, or paper of any description, required by law to be stamped, shall be deemed or held invalid and of no effect for the want of the particular kind or description of stamp designated for and denoting the tax on any such instrument, document, writing, or paper, provided a legal stamp or stamps, denoting a tax of equal amount, shall have been duly affixed and used thereon; but the provisions of this section shall not apply to any stamp appropriated to denote the tax charged on proprietary articles, or articles enumerated in schedule C.

No amendment was offered.

The committee here rose informally; and Mr. BLAINE took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its Clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, House joint resolution No. 137, requesting the President to intercede with her majesty, the Queen of Great Britain, to secure the speedy release of Rev. John McMahon, convicted on a charge of treason-felony, and now confined at Kingston, Canada West.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (S. R. No. 121) to carry into effect the resolution approved March 2, 1867, providing for the exchange of public documents, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

INTERNAL TAX BILL.

The Committee of the Whole again resumed the consideration of the internal tax bill.

The following section was read:

SEC. 110. And be it further enacted, That there shall be levied, collected, and paid as taxes, upon every package, parcel, article, or thing mentioned and described in schedule C, the several amounts of money set down in figures against the same respectively, or otherwise specified or set forth in said schedule, the payment of which amounts shall be indicated and proved by adhesive stamps to be affixed to such package, parcel, article, or thing, and canceled in the manner and form prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and the articles named in said schedule of foreign manufacture, imported into the United States, shall, in addition to the import duties imposed on the same, be subject to the taxes therein prescribed, and shall have the proper stamps affixed thereon and canceled; and any person who shall sell or offer for sale any of such articles, whether of foreign or domestic manufacture, shall be deemed the manufacturer thereof, and shall be subject to all the taxes, liabilities, and penalties imposed by law upon such manufacturers.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move, by instruction of the Committee of Ways and Means, to amend the section just read by adding to it the following:

And the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may, from time to time, furnish, supply, and deliver to any manufacturer of friction or other matches, cigar lights, or wax tapers, a suitable quantity of adhesive or other stamps, such as may be prescribed for use in such cases, without prepayment therefor, on a credit of not exceeding sixty days, requiring, in advance, a bond in a penal sum of not less than double the denominate value of such stamps, with such security as he may judge necessary, to secure payment therefor to the United States within the time prescribed for such payment. And upon all such bonds or other securities taken by said Commissioner, suits may be maintained in the circuit or district courts of the United States, in the several districts where any of the persons giving said bonds or other securities reside or may be found, in any appropriate form of action.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to insert the following, as an additional section, to come in immediately after the section just read:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That no stamp tax shall be imposed upon any uncombined medicinal drug or chemical, nor upon any medicine compounded according to the United States or other national pharmacopœia, or of which the full and proper formula is published in any of the dispensaries now or hitherto in common use among physicians or apothecaries, or in any pharmaceutical journal now issued by any incorporated college of pharmacy, when not sold or offered for sale, or advertised under any other name, form, or guise than that under which they may be severally denominated and laid down in said pharmacopœias, dispensaries, or journals as aforesaid; nor upon medicines sold to or for the use of any person, which may be mixed and compounded for said person according to the written receipt or prescription of any physician or surgeon. But nothing in this section shall be construed to exempt from stamp tax any medicinal articles, whether simple or compounded by any rule, authority, or formula, published or unpublished, which are put up in a style or manner similar to that of patent or proprietary medicines in general, or advertised in newspapers or by public handbills for popular sale and use, as having any special proprietary claim to merit, or to any peculiar advantage in mode of preparation, quality, use, or effect, whether such claim be real or pretended.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Before the question is taken upon the amendment or additional section, just moved by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. SCHENCK,] I desire to move to amend section one hundred and ten by adding to it the following:

Provided, That when such imported articles, except playing-cards, lucifer friction matches, cigar lights, and wax tapers, shall be sold in the original and unbroken package in which the bottles or other inclosures were packed by the manufacturer, the person so selling said articles shall not be subject to any penalty on account of the want of the proper stamp.

This is simply the provision of the present law, and a provision which it seems to me is practically very important. It will be observed that this section provides a penalty upon persons offering for sale these articles. I cannot learn that any frauds have resulted from the present law. I think this provision is eminently worthy of consideration as a practical provision.

Mr. SCHENCK. The amendment of the gentleman, my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. GRISWOLD,] does not strictly relate to my amendment, which is to insert an additional section. But I am willing that the question should be first taken on his amendment. I admit that the provision he offers is the provision of the present law. The Committee of Ways and Means, however, though they very seldom disagree with each other, have not agreed with him in regard to retaining that provision of the present law in this bill.

Now, instead of making any argument myself upon this provision, I will send to the Clerk's desk, to be read as my speech, a little article I have just discovered in a Philadelphia paper touching that subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Duties on Foreign and Domestic Perfumery. — A proviso attached to section one hundred and sixty-nine of the internal revenue law permits foreign perfumery to be sold in unbroken packages without being stamped when such perfumery is packed by the manufacturer. The effect of this provision is disastrous to our own manufacturers, since they are compelled by law to stamp all the perfumery made in their establishments, while the foreign merchant is allowed the privilege of disposing of his products without the stamp duty. Such a discrimination, to say the least, is unwise, and calculated to injure home manufacturers. But this is not the only evil caused by the proviso. Unprincipled parties in this and other cities, taking advantage of the license afforded them, are engaged in putting up their goods with imitation labels and trade-marks of the foreign article, thus cheating the Government, and by the fraud seriously injuring those who, in the legitimate business, cheerfully comply with the law and add to the revenue of the country. General SCHENCK, in reporting the new tax bill, has wisely stricken out this obnoxious proviso, and we trust that Congress, having an eye to the interest of American manufacturers and American industry, will look to it that foreign influence, and that of the swindlers in our own country, may not again have the clause 'snaked through' on the final passage of the bill."

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask the gentleman from New York to modify his amendment so as to strike out "provided that," and to insert "but;" so it will read "but when," for reasons that are obvious. I will not take the trouble to explain the reasons.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I accept that modification.

Mr. BARNES. I should like to have the amendment again read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, that provision is eminently just and proper. So far as protecting domestic manufacturers by not applying the stamp the tariff act which imposes duties on the arrival of these goods at our custom-houses can be so arranged as to collect an increased duty. There can be no conflict in that respect. The inconvenience to the merchant is great. The articles are small in character, and come in large cases, and the cases are opened and the small packages are opened and the wrappers disturbed in order to affix the stamp. It is a very serious inconvenience to the importer. I can see no reason for it except in the suggestion made by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that it gives a nominal advantage to the foreign manufacturer over the domestic manufacturer. That I say can be provided for by increasing the duties on imports. I think the amendment is eminently proper.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last line for the purpose of saying a few words in reference to the pending amendment. The article which was read at the request of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means was written by a friend of mine who is engaged in this trade in the city of Philadelphia. The manufacture of perfumery is carried on very largely in the city of Philadelphia; and a committee on the part of the gentlemen engaged in this trade very ably presented their case to the Committee of Ways and Means, as I think the chairman will admit. It is an unjust discrimination against our domestic manufacturers, and in favor of the foreign manufacturers to permit the latter to bring in their packages unbroken with a single stamp affixed, while the former are compelled to affix a stamp to every separate article. This injury to our manufactures ought to be remedied. I do not suppose that we are in favor of crushing out our own industry, in however slight degree, in behalf of the foreign manufacturer. I know the gentleman from New York does not want to do it. I am a tariff man, and in favor of home industry in every respect, and believe my friend is, and am therefore surprised he should have submitted this amendment. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. HIGBY. We have got into confusion about these amendments. The amendment of the gentleman from New York is to one portion of the bill and that of the gentleman from Ohio to another portion.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. BARNES. I rise to appeal from the decision of the Chair. I rose to speak to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio when the gentleman from New York moved his amendment, an amendment entirely distinct in its character.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw my amendment for the present.

The question was taken on Mr. GRISWOLD's amendment; and it was disagreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now renew the amendment which I withdrew for a moment.

Mr. BARNES. I desire the attention of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. I move to strike out all that part of the amendment which refers to excepted articles, the recipes of which are published in the pharmacopœia. There is a class of articles known as proprietary articles, some still under the control of the proprietors, and others which have passed from their control and become public. The latter are exempted while the others require stamps. I desire to increase the articles to be stamped by including the articles called the pharmacopœia articles. There are articles called Bacon's Drops and Godfrey's Cordial, which were started years ago by gentlemen of those names in England, and which are now manufactured by the trade all over the country. The recipes of those articles are published in the pharmacopœia. Druggists here and elsewhere make them up. The recipes purport to state what those articles are made of. Whether they do or not I do not know. Articles made from recipes called by other individual names are required to be stamped, and in character of article and the appearance of the package they are the same. There are a number of articles known to the trade as British patent medicines. There is a confusion in reference to excepted articles which is unnecessary. I desire that the articles excepted in the amendment of the chairman of the committee from stamping be stamped, to make all articles of a class come under one class with reference to stamps. I do not propose that physicians' prescriptions shall be stamped.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is impossible to get along in this way. We have proposed a section which is precisely a section taken from the present law. At first the committee were of opinion that it might be left out altogether. That, however, was thought to be illiberal, and upon reconsideration the committee instructed me to move to restore the exemption of certain articles as is now done in the present law. The gentleman thinks the section adopted from the present law, which contains the exemption is too broad, if I understand him—that it ought not to exempt so many things. I am perfectly willing to limit it if the gentleman will only put his amendment in some tangible shape. But to talk generally about the section being too broad, and exempting too many things without indicating wherein it is too broad, is a difficult way of managing a subject.

Mr. BARNES. I did not make myself understood by the chairman.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hear the gentleman with a great deal of difficulty.

Mr. BARNES. My amendment is to strike out all that part of his amendment which refers to articles excepted. Strike out all after the word "compounded" to the word "upon," referring to physicians' prescriptions.

Mr. SCHENCK. I understand the gentleman to propose to amend by striking out certain words, so that it shall read: "that no stamp tax shall be imposed upon any medicines sold to or for the use of any person," &c. I will accept that amendment, or, rather, as I have no right to accept it, I am willing to have a vote taken upon it.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was then agreed to.

Mr. BARNES. I move to amend section one hundred and ten, in line eight, by inserting after the word "thing," the words "exposed to view upon the outside of the wrapper, jar, or bottle," so that it will read, "by adhesive stamps to be affixed to such package, parcel, article, or thing exposed to view upon the outside of the wrapper, jar, or bottle," &c.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope that will not be adopted. It will be a great opening for fraud.

Mr. BARNES. It seems almost necessary, in order to protect the merchant who deals in these articles, that the stamps to be affixed by this section should be exposed to sight. In the majority of instances it is so. Probably ninety-nine per cent. of all the articles to which stamps are applied are stamped as this provision requires. There are some proprietors, however, who affix the stamps inside of the wrapper surrounding the bottle or jar, and a merchant, in buying a large quantity, in order to protect himself, is compelled to exempt each article, and in doing so he destroys its good appearance. There are accidents occurring in so slight a business as that. It is impossible to guard against employes putting up articles the value of which is three or four cents. They cannot be so watched that many of the articles will not be inclosed without a stamp upon them; and the proprietor himself, undertaking to guard his manufactory or laboratory with the best ability he can bring to bear, is not certain that he is not constantly violating the law. There is no way of detecting these omissions until a report comes from some part of the country that they find the articles unstamped. I have seen the most reliable merchants of this class of goods in the United States led into controversy with parties in the western States and California. Bills are unpaid on account of reclamation claims in which no proof can be offered; and I submit that it seems to be a necessary protection to the manufacturer himself and to the merchant that these stamps, in all instances, should be exposed to view.

*Mr. SCHENCK. I hope that amendment will not prevail.

The question was taken on Mr. BARNES'S amendment; and it was disagreed to.

The Clerk read the next section, as follows:

Sec. 111. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall make, prepare, sell, offer for sale, or remove for consumption or sale any article or thing enumerated and described in schedule C without affixing thereon and canceling the proper stamps as required by law; or shall conceal or remove, or cause to be concealed or removed, any such article or thing, in or to any place, with a view to evade the payment of the tax thereon; or shall remove, detach, or cause or permit to be removed or detached, the stamp from any such article or thing, with intent to use said stamp on any other article or thing, he shall forfeit to the United States the article or thing in regard to which either of the said offenses is committed; and shall for every such offense be liable to a penalty of $100, to be assessed and collected as in other cases.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment:

Page 159, section one hundred and eleven, strike out lines fourteen and fifteen, as follows: "penalty of $100, to be assessed and collected as in other cases," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "fine of not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, and the tax shall be assessed and collected as in other cases."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am also instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the section:

But friction or other matches, cigar lights, or wax tapers, may be sold and removed for export beyond the limits of the United States without payment of the tax thereon under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next section was read, as follows:

Sec. 112. And be it further enacted, That any proprietor of a proprietary article, or article subject to stamp duty under schedule C of this act, shall have the privilege of furnishing without expense to the United States, in suitable form, to be approved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, his own dies and designs for stamps therefor, to be for his exclusive use; which dies and designs, being first approved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, shall be made under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and retained in the Treasury Department, and the stamps prepared therefrom and issued to the Commissioner as in other cases. That in all cases where such stamp is used, the said stamp shall be so affixed on the article or package, that in using or opening the same the said stamp shall be effectually destroyed; and in default thereof the said proprietor shall be liable to the same penalty as is prescribed in this act for neglecting to affix a stamp. Any person who shall fraudulently obtain or use any such stamp, or die, or design therefor; and any person forging or counterfeiting, or causing or procuring the forging or counterfeiting any representation, likeness, similitude, or colorable imitation of any such stamp; or an engraver or printer who shall sell or give away any such stamp; or being a merchant, broker, peddler, or person dealing, in whole or in part, in similar goods, wares, merchandise, manufactures, preparations, or articles, or those designed for similar objects or purposes, shall have knowingly or fraudulently in his possession any such forged, counterfeited likeness, similitude, or colorable imitation of any such stamps, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned not less than one year nor more than five years.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer, from the Committee of Ways and Means, the following amendment:

Page 160, line nineteen, strike out all after the word "thereof" down to and including the word "purposes," in line twenty-six, as follows:

And any person forging or counterfeiting, or causing or procuring the forging or counterfeiting any representation, likeness, similitude, or colorable imitation of any such stamp; or an engraver or printer who shall sell or give away any such stamp; or being a merchant, broker, peddler, or person dealing, in whole or in part, in similar goods, wares, merchandise, manufactures, preparations, or articles, or those designed for similar objects or purposes.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

Or who shall forge or counterfeit, or cause or procure the forging or counterfeiting of any representation, likeness, similitude, or colorable imitation of any such stamp; or any engraver or printer who shall sell or give away any such stamp; or any person who.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SCHEDULE C.

Medicines or preparations.

For and upon every packet, box, bottle, pot, vial, or other inclosure, containing any pills, powders, tinctures, troches, lozenges, sirups, cordials, bitters, anodynes, tonics, plasters, liniments, salves, ointments, pastes, drops, waters, essences, spirits, oils, or other medicinal preparations or compositions whatsoever, made and sold, or removed for consumption and sale, by any person or persons whatever, wherein the person making or preparing the same has, or claims to have, any private formula or occult secret or art for the making or preparing the same, or has, or claims to have, any exclusive right or title to the making or preparing the same, or which are prepared, uttered, vended, or exposed for sale under any letters patent, or held out or recommended to the public by the makers, venders, or proprietors thereof as proprietary medicines, or as remedies or specifics for any disease, diseases, or affections whatever affecting the human or animal body, as follows: where such packet, box, bottle, pot, vial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall not exceed, at retail price or value, the sum of twenty-five cents, one cent.

Mr. SCHENCK. This is properly one paragraph down to the end of line seventy-seven. I ask that it may be read, so that I may offer an amendment from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BARNES. I must object until I know what the amendment is.

Mr. SCHENCK. I propose to strike out from line fifty-six to line seventy-seven inclusive.

Mr. BARNES. I shall be compelled to object, for I want to discuss the different amounts.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not see how the gentleman can object. I cannot make my motion until the part of the bill which I propose to amend is read. It is really one paragraph; it all relates to the same subject.

The CHAIRMAN. They are treated as separate paragraphs.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I offer the following amendment from the Committee of Ways and Means:

Page 161, line forty-four, strike out the words "secret and art," and insert "art or secret" in lieu thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now offer the following amendment from the Committee of Ways and Means:

Page 162, strike out from and including line fifty-six, down to the end of line seventy-seven, on page 163, as follows:

Retail price or value, the sum of twenty-five cents, one cent. Where such packet, box, bottle, pot, vial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall exceed the retail price or value of twenty-five cents, and not exceed the retail price or value of fifty cents, two cents. Where such packet, box, bottle, pot, vial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall exceed the retail price or value of fifty cents, and shall not exceed the retail price or value of seventy-five cents, three cents. Where such packet, box, bottle, pot, vial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall exceed the retail price or value of seventy-five cents, and shall not exceed the retail price or value of one dollar, four cents. Where such packet, box, bottle, pot, vial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall exceed the retail price or value of one dollar, for each and every fifty cents or fractional part thereof over and above the one dollar, as before mentioned, an additional two cents.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

The retail price or value to be fixed by the manufacturer of the article and stamped or printed there, the sum of twenty-five cents, one cent. Where such packet, box, bottle, pot, vial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall exceed such retail price or value of twenty-five cents, for each additional twenty-five cents, or fractional part thereof, an additional one cent.

Mr. BARNES. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "retail" and inserting "wholesale." This section of the bill is a very singular finance measure. It compels the manufacturer of a chair in Philadelphia to pay a tax upon the price which the chair shall be sold at retail in Chicago. The manufacturer of a book in Boston is to pay a tax, not upon the price which he receives for the book, but the price which the jobber in New York receives for it and the retailer in St. Louis. It seems to me one of the most singular recommendations in this bill that any manufacturer of an article should be taxed at any other price than that which he receives for his products. I have heard no explanation offered for this manner of taxation. Objectionable as the stamping of small articles is, to compel the manufacturer of these small articles to pay not only his own tax but that of every middleman until it reaches the consumer, is, if possible, still more objectionable. I assume that this House has too much practical sense to attempt to levy taxes in that way. I do not wish to impugn the practical ability or the good intentions of the gentlemen on the committee who have presented this recommendation. I understand the sources of their authority. A similar provision has been contained in bills enacted by previous Congresses; but the word "retail" has been included. A modification is now proposed so as to compel the proprietor to fix his price. He is thus practically driven to resort to a subterfuge by printing upon his articles a false price. By this means, I undertake to say, Yankee ingenuity will be able to evade this provision, so that nothing practically will be gained. Yet the proprietors are forced into this false position.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the House to the amount of the tax which it is proposed to impose upon these articles, assuming that the proprietor does print upon his articles the prices at which he thinks they ought to be sold in the locality where they are made. Those articles which sell at fifty cents a dozen or about four cents apiece, are taxed by the requirement of a stamp, one cent each, which is twenty-five per cent. Now, when billiard-tables are manufactured and sold at a taxation of one per cent., I ask whether this House, with its practical sense, is disposed to impose this onerous tax upon what is the poor man's medicine throughout the sparsely-settled districts of this country, making it pay a tax of twenty-five per cent.

Mr. BARNES'S amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BARNES. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "one cent," and inserting "one half cent." Mr. Chairman, I have endeavored from time to time to have this stamping system abolished, putting these articles where they belong, under an ad valorem system. The only argument, so far as I have been able to observe, by which the stamp system is defended, is that it is a convenient method of collecting taxes. Now, among the articles enumerated in this bill are billiard-tables and pianos, upon which a stamp could easily be put without any great inconvenience to the manufacturer or the seller; but to impose this stamp tax upon such articles as lucifer matches, the buckles on harness, the buttons on a coat, the cogs on a wheel, and require each of these articles to be manipulated in the manner here provided for, seems to me to be unreasonable.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman from New York will allow me to suggest that upon the articles he has just named there is but a single tax; the tax is collected only once; but a piano, for example, is taxed two dollars every year; and before it is worn out it may be taxed to the entire value of the instrument.

Mr. BARNES. I will reply to the gentleman by saying that as to the articles named in this paragraph, seventy per cent. of them are necessarily composed of double proof-spirits. The manufacturer now pays a tax of at least four hundred per cent. on seventy-five per cent. of his materials. We have in this case an instance of taxation multiplied to a most unreasonable extent. It is the severest taxation enumerated in this bill, and the most difficult in its application. Such taxation cannot be to the advantage of the Government. Now, sir, if stamps are a convenient mode of collecting taxes, why do not the committee propose to extend this system further? Why do they not impose a stamp duty upon native wines, instead of taxing them six dollars a dozen? Why do they not propose to require stamps in regard to various other articles enumerated in this bill? It would seem as if those articles with reference to which this stamp tax is most inconvenient had been sought out to be subjected to it.

Mr. Chairman, these stamp duties are a relic of a departing system which has been in vogue in England and France. The stamping system in those countries has almost thrown out of commercial circulation those articles upon which stamps have been required. When our internal tax law was first framed, precedents were looked for, and the English law being convenient this system was adopted. Gentlemen have referred to the large profits which they supposed to be made in the manufacture of such articles as those embraced in the paragraph now under consideration. Now, sir, having investigated this subject, I say upon the honor of a gentleman that there is to-day a smaller percentage of profit upon this branch of trade than upon any other in this country with which I am acquainted. Many articles which a few years ago were a source of profit not only to the proprietors, but to the advertising press of the country, are now yielding no profit or are making bankrupt those who own them. So much with reference to the ability of these articles to pay the taxes here imposed upon them. I have proposed to the Committee of Ways and Means to fix upon these articles an ad valorem or specific tax. They have not chosen to meet the question in that way. Why is it, sir, that under this bill an article of luxury is taxed one half per cent., while one of these articles which are in many cases articles of necessity are taxed from six per cent. to fifty per cent. In the whole enumeration I cannot find a single article which is taxed less than six per cent. I ask gentlemen of the House to divest themselves of the prejudices attempted to be created by the remarks gratuitously offered by gentlemen on the other side, and to look at this business in the same manner they look at the business of the manufacturer of patent leather, the manufacturer of pianos or of other articles mentioned in the bill. Is it fair? Is it right? Is it becoming practical men to make the invidious discrimination proposed in this bill?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BARNES's amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK's amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Perfumery and cosmetics.

For and upon every packet, box, bottle, pot, vial, or other inclosure, containing any essence, extract, toilet water, cosmetic, hair-oil, pomade, hair-dressing, hair restorative, hair dye, tooth-wash, dentifrice, tooth-paste, aromatic cachous, or any similar articles, by whatsoever name the same heretofore have been, now are, or may hereafter be called, known or distinguished, used or applied, or to be used or applied as perfumes or applications to the hair, mouth, or skin, made, prepared, and sold or removed for consumption and sale in the United States, where such packet, box, bottle, pot, vial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall not exceed the retail price or value of twenty-five cents, one cent. Where such packet, box, bottle, pot, vial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall exceed the retail price or value of twenty-five cents, and shall not exceed the retail price or value of fifty cents, two cents. Where such packet, box, bottle, pot, vial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall exceed the retail price or value of fifty cents, and shall not exceed the retail price or value of seventy-five cents, three cents. Where such packet, box, bottle, pot, vial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall exceed the retail price or value of seventy-five cents, and shall not exceed the retail price or value of one dollar, four cents. Where such packet, box, bottle, pot, vial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall exceed the retail price or value of one dollar, for each and every fifty cents or fractional part thereof over and above the one dollar, as before mentioned, an additional two cents.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend by striking out in the paragraph just read the following:

The sum of twenty-five cents, one cent. Where such packet, box, bottle, pot, vial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall exceed the retail price or value of twenty-five cents, and shall not exceed the retail price or value of fifty cents, two cents. Where such packet, box, bottle, pot, vial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall exceed the retail price or value of fifty cents, and shall not exceed the retail price or value of seventy-five cents, three cents. Where such packet, box, bottle, pot, vial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall exceed the retail price or value of seventy-five cents, and shall not exceed the retail price or value of one dollar, four cents. Where such packet, box, bottle, pot, vial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall exceed the retail price or value of one dollar, for each and every fifty cents or fractional part thereof over and above the one dollar, as before mentioned, an additional two cents.

And inserting in lieu thereof the following:

To be fixed by the manufacturer of the article, and stamped or printed thereon, the sum of twenty-five cents, one cent; and where such packet, box, bottle, vial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall exceed such retail price or value of twenty-five cents, for each and every additional twenty-five cents, or fractional part thereof, an addition of one cent.

Mr. BARNES. I move to strike out "retail" and insert "wholesale." Mr. Chairman, I do not think that this question is understood by the House. Of course I have no idea that I can make it better understood than it is now. I will not take up the time of the committee in arguing the question. It may appear that my particular advocacy of subjects pertaining to this class of cases has some personal motive in it; and I desire to say that I am a wholesale merchant in New York, and that handling this class of cases I understand the inconvenience of this manner of paying duties. I do not come here asking favors. I have not asked that this class of manufactured goods or that these merchants shall not be taxed as severely as any others. But I do desire to present their claims, as they have requested, upon the simple ground of equity. They merely wished to be relieved from arrogance and trouble, and the loss of stamps. They desire that Congress, which makes laws now so onerous against them, should understand that they were paying two or three taxes on their products. They pay the wholesale druggist's tax, and the retail tax, as well as their own tax.

Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire. Has the gentleman any other objection to this matter of taxation except the expense of the mechanical labor of putting the stamps upon the articles?

Mr. BARNES. There is a great deal of expense. It will appear that these articles are small in amount. They have to be spread over immense premises in a damp state. The room for conducting business of this kind is large. Superintendence for the application of these small stamps is large. The manual labor in applying them is great. Then there are the losses of stamps, which cannot be exactly estimated, but it is a very large item. Then in addition to all those annoyances to these reputable manufacturers comes in the fact that they pay, in no instance, less than six per cent., and as high as fifty per cent. on the top of special tax.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SCHENCK's amendment was then adopted.

No further amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Friction matches, or lucifer matches, or other articles made in part of wood, and used for like purposes, in parcels or packages containing one hundred matches or less, for each parcel or package, one cent.

No amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

When in parcels or packages containing more than one hundred and not more than two hundred matches, for each parcel or package, two cents.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to strike that paragraph out.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

And for every additional one hundred matches or fractional part thereof, one cent.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to insert after the word "thereof" the words "an addition of."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman whether he has made provision against a fraud which two years ago was largely practiced against the Government in reference to these stamps on matches? Manufacturers of matches made them of double length, and dipped both ends, thus getting two matches instead of one, which was a source of complaint, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue recommended that it should be provided against.

Mr. SCHENCK. By regulation and decision of the Department such matches are counted as two matches.

No further amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

For wax tapers, double the rates herein imposed upon friction or lucifer matches; on cigar lights, made in part of wood, wax, glass, paper, or other materials, in parcels or packages containing twenty-five lights or less in each parcel or package, one cent.

No amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

When in parcels or packages containing more than twenty-five and not more than fifty lights, two cents.

For every additional twenty-five lights or fractional part of that number, one cent additional.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to strike that out and insert in lieu of it as follows:

For every additional twenty-five lights or fractional part of that number, an addition of one cent.

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Playing-cards. For and upon every pack not exceeding fifty-two cards in number, irrespective of price or value, five cents.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move to insert after that paragraph the following:

Provided, That no stamp duty shall be required on any certificate or receipt given for goods received by any pawnbroker where the money advanced upon said goods does not exceed — dollars.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a point of order. The amendment is not germane.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is to be added to the provision in regard to stamps; therefore I think it germane. I do request the Committee of the Whole to hear me one moment on this subject. It belongs to the stamp law, and should go in somewhere.

Mr. ALLISON. If I understand it, it relates to stamps on receipts.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is on certificates or receipts given by pawnbrokers.

Mr. ALLISON. We have stricken out stamps on receipts entirely.

Mr. ROBINSON. This is certificates. I think the committee will see its importance.

Mr. GARFIELD. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. ROBINSON. In a great many cases persons go to pawnbrokers with a very small pledge, something of the value of a dollar, perhaps, upon which they receive five or ten cents. I believe it is now the requirement to put a five-cent stamp on the certificate which the pawnbroker gives, so that the person who makes the pledge gets his five or ten cents and then has to pay an additional five cents for the stamp. This makes it ruinous to these poor people. There is a story of a woman who, every morning after breakfast, pawned her husband's razor, and redeemed it so that her husband would have it the next morning for shaving again. That, perhaps, is an extreme case, but there are cases where articles of the value of a dollar upon which they receive ten or fifteen cents are pledged again and again, and as the law is now interpreted—and I do not think the Committee of Ways and Means have been informed of this interpretation—these pawnbrokers have to affix a five-cent stamp on the certificate, and these poor people have to pay for it. It is wrong to compel these poor people to pay this tax in this way. Having said this much, and having put the chairman of the committee [Mr. SCHENCK] in a good humor a minute ago, I trust he will allow me to make this amendment either in the place I have indicated, or on page 145, line one hundred and fourteen, if it is improper to be inserted here.

Mr. SCHENCK. When the gentleman asked me to make an amendment in schedule C, I said, "Certainly." It did not occur to me, however, that he was going to make it to a different part of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think it makes not much difference where it goes in.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope it will not go in anywhere.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that it go in here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules it out of order. The gentleman can introduce it as an independent paragraph. It properly belongs on page 145.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move it as an independent paragraph.

Mr. ALLISON. It seems to me we should have no special legislation for these pawnbrokers.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is not for pawnbrokers.

Mr. ALLISON. We have stricken out the provision in relation to stamps on receipts, and it will be the easiest thing in the world for pawnbrokers instead of giving a certificate for a razor that has been pledged simply to give a receipt for the razor and so avoid the tax entirely. I think there will be no difficulty about it.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is not the pawnbroker I am trying to protect, but the poor people, to whom this is charged. The internal revenue department will still insist, no doubt, in doing as they have done. I move the amendment as a separate paragraph, and I will fill the blank with the words "one dollar;" so that it will read:

No stamp duty shall be required on any certificate or receipt for goods received by any pawnbroker when the money advanced on said goods does not exceed one dollar.

Anything to save these poor people.

The question being taken on the amendment, there were—ayes 83, noes 25.

The amendment was, by unanimous consent, considered as agreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope that, by general consent, the amendment of the gentleman from New York, which has just been adopted, will be inserted on page 145, where it appropriately belongs.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, we can easily fix that when we get into the House.

Mr. ALLISON. I object to going back.

The next section was read, as follows:

Banks and Bankers.

SEC. 113. And be it further enacted, That there shall be levied, collected, and paid a tax of one twenty-fourth of one per cent. each month upon the average amount of the deposits of money, subject to payment by check or draft, or represented by certificates of deposit or otherwise, whether payable on demand or at some future date, with any person, bank, association, company, or corporation engaged in the business of banking; and a tax of one twenty-fourth of one per cent. each month, as aforesaid, upon the capital of any bank, association, company, or corporation, and on the capital employed by any person in the business of banking, beyond the average amount invested in United States bonds; and a tax of one sixteenth of one per cent. each month upon the average amount of circulation issued by any bank, association, corporation, company, or person, including as circulation all certified checks and all notes and other obligations calculated or intended to circulate or to be used as money, but not including that in the vault of the bank, or redeemed and on deposit for said bank. And a true and accurate return of the amount of circulation, of deposits and of capital, as aforesaid, and of the amount of notes of persons, State banks and State banking associations, and of cities, towns, or other municipal corporations, paid out by them for the previous month, shall be made and rendered monthly by each of them to the assessor of the district in which such bank, association, corporation, or company may be located, or in which such person has his place of business, with a declaration annexed thereto, verified by the oath or affirmation of such person, or of the president or cashier of such bank, association, corporation, or company, in such form and manner as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. And for any refusal or neglect to make or to render such return and pay the tax, any such bank, association, corporation, company, or person so in default shall be subject to and pay a penalty of $200, besides the additional penalty and forfeitures in other cases provided by law; and in default of such return the several amounts subject to tax shall be estimated by the assessor or assistant assessor on the best information he can obtain. And in the case of banks with branches each branch shall make a separate return, and the tax shall be assessed on the deposits, circulation, and capital of each severally. And so much of the forty-first section of the "Act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, as imposes a tax on the banks organized under that act, be, and is hereby, repealed: Provided, That the deposits in associations or companies known as provident institutions, savings banks, savings funds, or savings institutions, having no capital stock and doing no other business than receiving deposits to be loaned or invested for the sole benefit of the parties making such deposits, without profit or compensation to the association or company, shall be exempt from tax on so much of their deposits as they have invested in securities of the United States, and on all deposits less than $500 made in the name of any one person; and the returns required to be made by such provident institutions and savings banks shall be made on the first Monday of January and July of each year, in such form and manner as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment:

Page 166, line one hundred and twenty-three, before the word "cities" insert the word "State;" so that it will read:

And a true and accurate return of the amount of circulation, of deposit, and of capital, as aforesaid, and of the amount of notes of persons, State banks and State banking associations, and of State, cities, towns, or other municipal corporations, paid out by them for the previous month, shall be made and rendered monthly, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am also instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment:

Page 167, line forty-two, strike out the words "the deposits, circulation, and capital of;" so that the clause will read:

And in the case of banks with branches each branch shall make a separate return, and the tax shall be assessed on each severally.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer the following amendment from the Committee of Ways and Means:

Page 167, at the end of line forty-seven insert the words "and requires returns to be made to the Treasurer of the United States;" so that the clause will read:

And so much of the forty-first section of the act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof, approved June 3, 1864, as imposes a tax on the banks organized under that act, and requires returns to be made to the Treasurer of the United States, be, and is hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. On page 166, line fourteen, I move to strike out "one sixth" and insert "one twenty-fourth" in lieu thereof; so that the clause will read:

And a tax of one twenty-fourth of one per cent. each month upon the average amount of circulation issued by any bank, association, corporation, company, or person.

I make the motion for the reasons which I will state briefly, and I would like to have the attention of the committee for a very short time. Take a bank of $200,000 capital. This bill proposes to tax them half of one per cent. on their capital; that is $1,000. Then half of one per cent on their deposits. I suppose the bank will have $500,000 deposits. I am not supposing a case; I have such a bank right in my eye. That makes a tax of $2,500 on deposits. Then there is a $400 tax imposed before they can commence business. Put that down. The first thing a bank has to do is to pay into the Treasury of the United States $400. And then this bill proposes to tax them two per cent. on their circulation. If the bank has a capital of $200,000, it will have a circulation of $180,000. Two per cent. on $180,000 is $3,600. Now, if gentlemen have put the figures down, they will find that I have got three and three quarters per cent. on the capital.

Now, in the next place, I assume—at least I do not assume it, for I have the papers to prove it—that it will cost for the expenses of running the bank a little over two per cent. on the capital. Put it down at two per cent. in round numbers. Gentlemen ask me if that is a national tax. I tell them no; it is for rent of the bank building, pay of the cashier, teller, book-keeper, and discount clerk—I do not include pay of the president and directors—and fuel, light, and stationery, without which a bank cannot run. Now, if gentlemen will put the figures together, they will discover that they have got between eight and ten per cent. on the capital of that bank. I know, sir, that a man who stands up here to advocate the cause of banks or railroads is in a losing business, and I do not expect that this will amount to anything. But I advertise gentlemen that no bank, unless it be in some Atlantic city, or at some central point of commercial operations, can do business under this tax. It must be very plain to any gentleman that if he has $100,000 to invest he had better loan it out at current rates of interest at six, eight, or ten per cent., and have no expense for Government or State tax, than to bank with it under the national banking law, with that law as it now stands. And, by the way, let me here remark that I have not included the State, county, and municipal tax, which a friend near me suggests is two and a half per cent. If it be the object of the Committee of Ways and Means to get rid of these banks this will answer first rate.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman inform us what his bank, as he describes it, gets as interest on its loans? He says the capital is $200,000. What amount of loans does it draw interest on?

Mr. BLAINE. In other words, what is the amount of its deposits.

Mr. PRICE. I have told the gentleman; about five hundred thousand dollars. It has a circulation of $180,000.

But there is another item connected with this matter. In reference to banks with a capital under $200,000, the rate of interest would be greater. Go into the country, away from the great commercial centers, you will find $50,000 and $100,000 banks; the majority of them will be of that class.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I do not think the gentleman has answered my question. He states that his bank has a capital of $200,000, a circulation of $180,000, and $500,000 of deposits, making $880,000 in all.

Mr. SAWYER. Does the gentleman suppose a bank will loan its entire capital?

Mr. PRICE. If my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] thinks our banks loan all their deposits, their circulation, and their capital, he is very much mistaken.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Answer my question, if you please.

Mr. PRICE. There have been questions put to me, looking toward the investment of the capital of a bank; I am not certain whether they are put for the purpose of acquiring information, or for an opposite purpose.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I put my question for the purpose of getting the gentleman's statement before the committee.

Mr. PRICE. I hope my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] will keep as quiet as a man of his temperament can until I am through. Then he can take his five minutes, and I will listen to him with a great deal of pleasure. I suppose that gentlemen all know that before a bank can get its $180,000 circulation, it has to put $200,000 in bonds on deposit in the Treasury of the United States. That is where its capital goes.

Mr. BLAINE. And the bank gets six per cent. interest in gold on those bonds.

Mr. PRICE. Yes; so they do; but they do not lend it out in every direction. And this interest I have ciphered up here more than eats up the interest the bank gets on its bonds. The expense of running the bank under the law is more than that. Therefore, as I have said, so far as that goes the bank is losing money, and had far better keep its money out of the bank and use it in some other kind of business. There is nothing wrong in these figures of mine. And when my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] gets the floor I want him to show me where the figures are wrong if he can, and not deal in glittering generalities.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I rise formally to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE], for the purpose of giving the gentleman an opportunity to answer my question fairly and squarely. He says that the capital of his bank is $200,000.

Mr. PRICE. I did not say my bank.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Well, the bank which he presented by way of illustrating his position. He said he knew all about it, and I supposed it was his bank. That bank has a capital of $200,000, a circulation of $180,000, and deposits to the amount of $500,000, making $880,000 in all.

Mr. PRICE. The bank is obliged to keep a reserve.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I admit that a portion of it is held in reserve; but I think the gentleman will admit that the bank, under all circumstances, will find a reserve of $280,000 sufficient, thus leaving, aside from its capital, $400,000 which it can loan. At six per cent., that will be $24,000 which it receives for interest on its loans. Then, on the bonds it has deposited in the Treasury for its circulation, it receives interest at the rate of six per cent. in gold, which will be equal to at least eight per cent. in currency.

Mr. MULLINS. It is equal to $8 40 in currency.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. That will then be equal to $16,800 in currency, which the bank receives as interest on its bonds; which, added to the $24,000 it receives as interest on its loans, will make $40,800. Now, I think when the gentleman comes to deduct his expenses from that amount, he will find that there is a pretty good margin left as profits.

Mr. PRICE. With a little experience in banking, I confess it never occurred to me that it was quite so profitable a business as my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. Hooper] makes it out to be. The banker takes $200,000 to start with; that is all there is in the concern, and buys bonds with every dollar of it, and those bonds are deposited in the Treasury of the United States. For that $200,000 in bonds draws back $180,000 in currency. He receives his current deposits in the bank $500,000. He has now $680,000. He proposes out of that, $680,000 to loan $600,000.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. My statement was that the bank has altogether $880,000, of which it loans $400,000, making, with the $200,000 in bonds, $600,000 upon which the bank receives interest, leaving $280,000 for reserve.

Mr. PRICE. I beg the gentleman's pardon if I do not state his position correctly. This banker has on hand altogether $680,000, $500,000 of which is current deposits; and he loans $600,000, leaving $80,000 with which to meet that indebtedness of $500,000 due the depositors. Would $80,000 be considered by sound bankers a sufficient margin?

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Two hundred and eighty thousand dollars.

Mr. PRICE. No; the gentleman is mistaken. There are $680,000 to start with, $500,000 of deposits and $180,000 of circulation.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. And $200,000 capital.

Mr. PRICE. But the capital is in bonds. My friend counts that $200,000 twice.

Mr. PIKE. I would like to ask the gentleman whether such a bank as that pays.

Mr. DAWES. I move pro forma to amend the amendment by striking out "one twenty-fourth," and inserting "one twelfth." I make this motion merely for the purpose of inquiring of my colleague, [Mr. Hooper, of Massachusetts,] who seems to have charge of this part of the bill, first, what reason has governed the Committee of Ways and Means in proposing to double the tax upon circulation without increasing the tax upon deposits; and secondly, what will be the effect of this change upon the country banks as compared with the city banks? I yield my colleague the remainder of my time that he may answer these questions.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I will say frankly, in reply to the question of my colleague, that our reason for proposing to increase the tax upon circulation was that this circulation is furnished by the United States; the credit of this circulation is the credit of the Government, the Government being responsible for it; and we thought it not unfair, under the circumstances, that the Government should receive one third of the lowest rate of interest which a bank gets by loaning that circulation. If my colleague will look at the returns made by the Comptroller of the Currency, he will find that, with every national bank, the whole amount of its circulation (I say the whole, because it is so nearly that) is constantly out, constantly drawing interest for the bank. No bank gets less than six per cent. on the amount it has in circulation; and as this circulation is furnished by the Government, circulated upon the faith and credit of the Government, the Government being responsible for it, it seemed to the committee perfectly just that the Government should receive as tax one third of the interest which the bank earns upon it at the lowest rates at which banks are in the habit of loaning money. Another consideration was that there had been a great deal of discussion in regard to the injustice of permitting the banks to have any circulation at all.

In reply to the other branch of my colleague's question, I will say that this proposed increase of taxation on circulation will, I think, operate in the same way upon the country and the city banks in proportion to the amount of their respective circulation. It appears to me that upon a city bank with $200,000 circulation the effect would be precisely the same as upon a country bank with $200,000 circulation.

Mr. DAWES. How are the comparative deposits of the city and the country banks?

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I presume the deposits are heavier in the cities.

Mr. BLAINE. Take, for instance, the Merchant's Bank of Boston, the largest bank in Boston.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I do not refer to individual cases.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to oppose the amendment proposed by my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] and I judge from the question he asked his colleague that he himself lives in the region of country banks. Now, sir, I do not desire this controversy between the city and country banks shall result in reducing this tax upon circulation. I find from an examination of the report of the Comptroller of the Currency that the taxes paid by these banks average two and a quarter per cent. to the United States, and a like sum to the several States. That is the existing tax on the circulation of the national banks. I do not know whether he is seriously in favor of the reduction of that or not. The effect of this bill is to increase the tax on the circulation of national banks one per cent. They are now taxed one per cent. per annum on the circulation, and we propose a tax of two per cent. I think the answer of my colleague on the committee a good one.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the gentleman argue, as the taxes now stand, that it is fairer to put double tax upon the circulation than upon the deposits?

Mr. ALLISON. If he is anxious to put a tax upon deposits—

Mr. BLAINE. My question is whether if you are going to raise so much tax out of the national bank system which is the fairest way to get it.

Mr. ALLISON. That is a pertinent question. One way is to tax the circulation of national banks.

Mr. BLAINE. They are already taxed one per cent. upon circulation.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that, and I have so stated that the circulation of the national banks is taxed one per cent. This circulation is an absolute gratuity to these banks. These banks in the cities as well as in the country issue every dollar of circulation that they are authorized to issue, and they send these notes out into circulation from Maine to the Gulf of Mexico. They do not redeem them, and if they did it would be in greenbacks, which, practically, is no redemption. My idea is that these national banks can maintain this tax so long as we do not resume specie payment. I am sorry that my colleague [Mr. PRICE] did not answer what the bank he cited received annually in the shape of dividends. I do not know of any national bank that has not divided semi-annually a respectable dividend. If he will turn to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency he will find that each one of them has a respectable surplus.

Mr. DAWES. How do the dividends of the city banks compare with those of the country banks?

Mr. ALLISON. I will answer the gentleman. I think that much depends upon the management of the banks. I know of a bank in Chicago that pays a semi-annual dividend of twenty per cent. That is a good bank. It is well managed. I know some country banks that pay semi-annual dividends of fifteen per cent. These are well managed banks. Now, what we propose is an additional tax on these national banks of $3,000,000.

Mr. PRICE. Are there not banks which have been compelled to wind up, and which do no business?

Mr. ALLISON. Of course. There was one in the oil region of Pennsylvania. It will not pay to do business if they are not well managed. These national banks have special privileges thrown around them. Their charters are valuable whether in city or country. They monopolize because of their charters all the business in the cities and drive out private bankers.

Mr. BENTON. I ask if this tax on circulation is not calculated to prevent circulation and to restrict it?

Mr. ALLISON. That is an answer to my friend over the way. If these national banks are not satisfied with their circulation, let them return it, and we will find others that will take it. I know several towns in my State without national banks, and they cannot get this circulation because it is monopolized by New York and New England. We propose a tax of $3,000,000 on the circulation of the national banks, and having this monopoly they can well afford it.

Mr. DAWES. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to strike out one twenty-fourth and make it one twenty-fifth, merely for the purpose of making a remark in reply to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE.] I will leave without comment the answer made by my colleague on the committee, showing that upon his own statement the bank that he had in his mind ought to make sixteen per cent. net. But there is another funny fallacy, if I may be allowed to make the alliteration, which he has been treating us to. What have we done? We have left the tax on deposits as it was, we have taxed the capital the same, one twenty-fourth of one per cent., and we have increased by this bill the tax on circulation from one twelfth of one per cent. to one sixth. Now, what is the gentleman's calculation? He says we have charged one twenty-fourth on deposits, which is one half per cent. a year; one twenty-fourth on capital, which is another half per cent. a year, and we have charged one sixth on circulation, which is two per cent. a year; thus making, says he, three per cent. on the property of the banker. Now, suppose I had a pig, a horse, and a cow, and I paid twenty-five cents on the pig, one dollar on the horse, and seventy-five cents on the cow. Adding them all together the gentleman would say that I paid two dollars all round, on the pig, the horse, and the cow. That would be precisely his argument. We charge so much on deposits, so much on capital, and so much on circulation—separate things. The gentleman adds them all together and makes three per cent. a year, and he says that we are charging three per cent. on all the property in the banks. It is precisely the case of the pig, horse, and cow. Although the tax is paid on each separate thing, he takes the aggregate and makes out his case.

I am merely giving this as a specimen of the gentleman's logic. Now, what we propose is, as we tax the privilege of supplying the country with money upon that franchise by which the banks furnish the circulation, we thought we might well afford, now that we extend this franchise to the national banks—which are in fact all that are really worth considering, because the State banks have been driven pretty much out of existence—to add another one twelfth, and thus make it one sixth of one per cent. per annum instead of one-twelfth as before.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to say, with all due respect for the Committee of Ways and Means, that if they had attempted to make a most injurious discrimination against the country banks they could not have better contrived to do it than they have done in this bill. I am not here to oppose an increased tax or circulation, nor to oppose any tax on national banks which they can stand. But I do maintain that of all the banks in the land that are able to stand a heavy tax the class which can stand it the best are the large State banks which have an enormous line of deposits. And if you will put one half per cent. per annum upon their deposits, unless I am entirely mistaken in my statistics—and I take them now from memory—you will get as much as one per cent. will give on circulation. I think the average is about five hundred and forty million dollars; it may be six hundred million dollars. Now then, put one half per cent. on that amount, and it gives you $3,000,000. Now, in regard to the country banks, the case cited as an illustration by my friend from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] is no fair sample. A bank with $200,000 capital that has $500,000 deposits is a very rare thing. There are three banks in my little town. There is not one of them that begins to have a deposit equal to its capital. The entire capital of the three banks is only $450,000, and there was never more than $250,000 of deposits at any one time.

Mr. PRICE. I know a bank on the sun-down side of the Mississippi with $100,000 capital that has over half a million of deposits.

Mr. BLAINE. Very well; that is in the West. The bank in Chicago that my friend alluded to which divided twenty per cent. is also in the West. But I know of no such bank in New England, unless it be in Boston. If there is any class of capital in this country that can stand an additional tax it is the large banks that have these enormous deposits, and while I am not arguing and do not intend to argue against putting an additional tax on circulation, I protest against allowing these enormous deposits to go untaxed. There is no class of property under the sun that can stand taxation so well as they can.

Mr. ALLISON. Does my friend know why there are large deposits in these banks?

Mr. BLAINE. Because the people put their money in them. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLISON. Well, that is a very good answer.

Mr. BLAINE. Why is it, then?

Mr. ALLISON. It is because they are allowed to receive interest on deposits.

Mr. BLAINE. So much the more reason why they should pay a tax.

Mr. ALLISON. Your country banks, instead of loaning their money to their neighbors for business purposes, send it to the business centers and speculate in stocks.

Mr. BLAINE. And you propose to make it easier for them to do that by not taxing the deposits.

Mr. ALLISON. Why does not the gentleman propose to increase the tax on deposits instead of fighting the tax on circulation?

Mr. BLAINE. I make the proposition to put one per cent. on the city banks, and it ought to have been done long ago. You will find that the city banks are making ten times as much on their deposits as they make on their capital, and they make it out of their depositors, and that large sum ought not to be allowed to go free.

Mr. SCHENCK. Well, offer your amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. It is not in order now. You strike at the country banks and affect them injuriously, and allow the city banks, which are much more able to bear taxation, to go scot free of additional burdens. That is my complaint against the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. SPALDING. What are the regular dividends of your banks?

Mr. BLAINE. I never knew them over ten per cent.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PIKE. I renew it. I wish to suggest a solution of this difficulty to the committee. Some of these gentlemen seem to represent city banks and others represent country banks. For my part I do not represent banks at all.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not either.

Mr. PIKE. I was going to suggest that we adopt the views of the country banks in relation to the city banks, and tax the city banks as much as the country banks think they ought to be taxed, and then tax the country banks what the city banks think they ought to be taxed. In that way we shall get a fair taxation all round. These gentlemen who are stockholders in these various institutions know, at any rate, and are entirely willing to confess, what their neighbors earn, and by the duplicate confession, one confessing to the other's earnings—I was not going to say their sins, but their earnings—we get the earnings of both classes, and in that way get at a fair and proper basis for taxation. Now, sir, this whole system is a monopoly. Here are three hundred million dollars or more in the banking business. I represent a population that does not share in this monopoly. We have been endeavoring, from time to time, to get some share in this banking business, but up to this time we have been entirely unable to do so except in one or two small instances. Now, then, let the city banks be taxed and the country banks taxed, and then if these gentlemen will but give up the business and give the rest of us a chance to get in it will give my constituents an opportunity. For one I am desirous of placing such a tax upon this peculiar business which is thus monopolized as shall reduce it to such a fair business as compared with the other business of the moneyed capital of this country as shall not make gentlemen so eager to monopolize the whole of it. Deposits are of course a very large source of income to city banks. Let the tax on those be increased to one per cent. Circulation is a large profit to the country banks particularly. Let the tax on that be increased. The imperial power is given them of furnishing the money of the country, and it is the creative power of money that we should tax. Then the taxes should be so as to reduce the earnings of the banks until they reach a point where they will be willing to share the monopoly with others.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I rise to oppose the amendment, and I would suggest as a compromise that the tax on deposits be increased from one twenty-fourth to one twelfth of one per cent. per month, and the tax on circulation be reduced from one sixth to one twelfth of one per cent. per month. That would make the tax one per cent. per annum on deposits, and one per cent. per annum on the circulation.

Mr. ALLISON. Would not the gentleman increase the tax on the capital from one twenty-fourth of one per cent. per month to one twelfth of one per cent., and thus make it equal all round, one per cent. per annum?

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I will come to that in a moment. My proposition would make the tax upon the deposits and upon the circulation one per cent. per annum. The bill as it now stands also has a clause imposing a tax upon the capital. But what is that tax, and upon what amount of capital? As this is in my line of business I ask gentlemen to pay a little attention to what I say in regard to it. The provision of the bill is as follows:

And a tax of one twenty-fourth of one per cent. each month, as aforesaid, upon the capital of any bank, association, company, or corporation, and on the capital employed by any person in the business of banking, beyond the average amount invested in United States bonds.

Now, the capital of most all these banks is all invested in United States bonds, so that under this provision there would be no tax at all paid upon the capital. Therefore, this tax of one half per cent. per annum is no charge against the banks, under this bill as it now stands, except upon that portion of the capital not invested in United States bonds, which in most cases amounts to nothing at all.

The tax of one per cent. per annum upon the circulation and deposits would make the tax, according to the estimate of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE,] two and a half per cent. to the national Government. Then there would be two and a half per cent. for State and municipal taxation, and two per cent. per annum for the expenses of the bank. That would make seven per cent. in all.

Now, all admit that upon the capital invested in United States bonds the bank, with the present price of gold, draws interest that is equivalent to at least eight per cent. in currency.

The average amount of deposits in country banks is about equal to their capital, or a little over; taking all the banks of the country it will average at least one and one half times the amount of the capital. There is no use in a bank where the deposits do not equal in amount the amount of the capital stock.

Now, assuming the deposits to equal in amount the amount of the capital, and hold one fourth of the deposits as a reserve, and allowing the banks to make their loans at only six per cent., and we have four and a half per cent. as interest on loans from deposits, and a like amount of four and a half per cent. as interest on loans from circulation after making allowance for the proper reserve, and we have nine per cent. upon the capital as interest on loans. That, together with the eight per cent. interest upon the capital received as interest upon the United States bonds in which the capital is invested, makes the total income of the bank equal to seventeen per cent. upon its capital. From this deduct the seven per cent. for taxes and expenses, and there is left of net income the sum of ten per cent. on the capital. That is evidently a fair percentage of profits on the capital employed in banking, and a larger percentage than is paid by a large majority of the manufacturing or other productive interests of the country.

Now, these banks, it must be borne in mind, are not required to redeem their circulation, but can count all the profits their circulation gives them, for the redemption of that circulation costs them nothing. These banks will not only pay ten per cent. to their stockholders, but will add to their surplus, as they have been doing hitherto, from five to twenty per cent. throughout the country.

I am, therefore, well satisfied that the banks can well afford to pay the increased tax which I propose by my amendment. And after that I will indicate another amendment which I think all will admit the propriety of making.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BENTON. I will state my position upon this question, and while doing so I desire the attention of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. I think the effect of this increase of tax upon the circulation will be to diminish the circulation. Now, so far as the public is interested in banks, it is interested in the circulation. The public is not interested in the amount of money which the banks make in their speculations in stocks and in all sorts of ways. You ought to put a tax not only on the circulation of the bank, but on its deposits, which are invested in stocks and various kinds of speculations. By this bill it is proposed to put an increased tax on circulation, but scarcely any tax whatever on these deposits, of which the banks have the use for purposes of speculation. By such a provision you exert a direct influence to prevent the banks from extending accommodations to the people.

Mr. Chairman, I have no fear that the banks will be taxed too much. These national banks have, since their establishment, paid their semi-annual dividends of ten, fifteen, and twenty per cent.; and any gentleman who stands up here and talks about these banks not being able to bear the taxation which we propose may address himself to men who do not understand how these banks make their money, but he should not talk to men like my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOOPER,] who know the utter fallacy of any such remarks.

I think with the gentleman from Maine [Mr.

BLAINE] that the increase of our taxation upon these banks ought to be mainly upon their deposits. These deposits are not only loaned out, but are invested in various profitable ways; and they can readily bear a heavy taxation for the support of the Government. I would not take away from these banks their circulation, a measure which has been advocated by some; but I would adopt such policy as to compel them to perform their legitimate function and accommodate the people. Now they do not do that. There are many of our banks, both in the cities and in the country, whose officers, when a loan is applied for, ask the applicant, "How much can you pay? What per cent. can you give?" They do not govern their operations by the law which in ordinary business regulates the transactions of men in regard to the use of their money, but they take all they can get; and I say, let the Government compel them to pay their full share of the taxes.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PIKE. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I will modify my amendment so as to strike out "twenty-fourth," and insert "twelfth;" making the rate of taxation on deposits one twelfth of one per cent.

Mr. PRICE. I modify my amendment so as to insert "one twelfth." This will make the rate of taxation the same that it is at present.

Mr. MILLER. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "one twelfth," and inserting "one fifteenth." I rise, Mr. Chairman, to say a word in regard to a question which seems to excite interest on all sides of the House. Some gentlemen think that these banks are merely of advantage to the stockholders and to no one else. These gentlemen are mistaken. I do not know about city banks, but I do know about the country banks, and I know that they are not only of advantage to the stockholders, but of advantage to the people generally. If this tax is increased, as it is proposed here, it will tax the country banks out of existence.

Gentlemen say if they are taxed out of existence they will take the circulation. If they are taxed out of existence it would not be long before we should hear of broken banks in the country. In the country the banks make money out of the circulation. I know, so far as the banks in my country are concerned, they make little money out of deposits. They depend upon what money they make on circulation. In the cities it is far different. The deposits there are large and they make a great deal of money on the deposits. But it is not so in the country. The proposition here is not only to tax the deposits, but to put a double tax upon the circulation. What will be the result? The result will be in many sections of the country that the banks will have to wind up. If they cannot make some money they will not run the risk.

Mr. STEWART. What amendment does the gentleman from Pennsylvania propose?

Mr. MILLER. I move to strike out one twelfth and insert one fifteenth.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa. As I was saying, so far as the banks in the country are concerned, this tax bill will be onerous. They cannot stand this tax. Gentlemen say let them go. They want to monopolize the banking business in the cities, but country people must be accommodated as well as those of the cities. Gentlemen must recollect that there are great losses in the banking business. Not only the drawers but the indorsers of notes fail, and large amounts of money are lost in that way. And as the banking system is not established the circulation is limited. When we had the State banks, before they were legislated out of existence, we could increase our circulation and the country people become accommodated. It is not so now.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope by unanimous consent all further debate on this section will be terminated.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

Mr. BLAINE. You cannot do that. There is no quorum.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I hope gentlemen will soon run out.

Mr. LYNCH. I rise to make a suggestion to the gentleman from West Virginia, and that is this: the particular case which has been brought before the House by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] of a bank which has $180,000 circulation and $500,000 deposits will not be much relieved by double taxation.

Mr. MILLER. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely desire to suggest an amendment for the consideration of the committee. It is this: I propose after the word "money" to insert "except on deposits of the Government, and on deposits of the Government there shall be a tax of four per cent."

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order now.

Mr. LOGAN. On the deposits of individuals, I do not know how it is in the East and New York, but in the West a great portion of the banks pay an interest of six per cent.; but on the Government deposits there is no interest paid whatever. At different times the Government has had millions of dollars on deposit for months from which it derived no interest whatever, while the banks derived from six to nine per cent.

Mr. LYNCH. Does not the Government have for every dollar of deposit in the banks ample security, while the individual depositors have no security?

Mr. LOGAN. Well, sir, I would like the gentleman to explain to me what amount the Government derives, so far as it is concerned, from the securities. They do not pay the Government one cent interest. There is a banking institution in this city that has had as high as $6,000,000 on deposit at a time, and it never paid one cent to the Government on that deposit.

Mr. LYNCH. The point I wished to make was the difference between the deposits of individuals who have no security whatever, who take their own risk, and the deposits of the Government, which are entirely secure; more so than if made in the sub-Treasury.

Mr. LOGAN. That only adds to what I said of the necessity of taxing the individual who makes deposits and receives his six or four per cent. as the case may be.

Mr. LYNCH. And takes his risk.

Mr. LOGAN. Takes his risk.

A MEMBER. Where do they pay six per cent.?

Mr. LOGAN. They do it in my part of the country to my certain knowledge. But the Government, in depositing, gets collateral; but on that collateral the Government pays six per cent. in gold. It does that for the advantage of having its money deposited in a bank out of which many a banker derives six per cent. interest beside the interest on the collateral. Now, sir, I purpose, in order to make this fair, that upon the Government deposits in the banks they shall be required to pay four per cent. Then as regards individual deposits the House may determine the percentage as it sees fit. I do not propose to change that part of the bill. This is all I desire to say. I shall ask a vote at the proper time.

Mr. O'NEILL. I desire to ask a question of the gentleman. Does not the Government receive some benefit from the convenience or advantage of having deposited its money in the banks of the country?

Mr. LOGAN. None on God's earth. It only gives these men a chance to turn the money and make a fortune out of it without giving the Government a particle of benefit.

Mr. PRICE. That happens to be a mistake.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, now, let us see.

Mr. PRICE. All over the country there are collection districts. The collectors must necessarily deposit their money somewhere, and in a great many instances there is no sub-Treasury and no place to keep the money in but the banks.

Mr. LOGAN. They can express it to the Government sub-Treasury very easily.

Mr. PRICE. Not every day.

Mr. LOGAN. The express runs every day, and there are sub-Treasuries all over the country where money can be deposited.

Mr. PRICE. Oh, no.

Mr. LOGAN. There is a sub-Treasury in New York and in every large city.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] whether the deputy collectors in the different districts deposit in the banks every night?

Mr. PRICE. I am happy to tell my friend that they do, so far as my knowledge is concerned.

Mr. LOGAN. If you have no bank what becomes of the money the collector has?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. They must have to travel a long distance.

Mr. O'NEILL. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] I understand it is impossible in many instances for the Government to have its money deposited in Government depositories; that is, in the sub-Treasury. Now, I presume, as a matter of course, the deposits must be made somewhere for the convenience of the Government. Let me illustrate it. In the State of Pennsylvania there is a vast amount of money collected by local taxation. The money is deposited in the State banks all over the Commonwealth, evidently to the convenience of the State.

Mr. LOGAN. Let me ask the gentleman a question. This Congress has passed a law requiring deposits to be made in the Government depositories or the sub-Treasury where the collection was made within five miles of the sub-Treasury. Is such a deposit in violation of law?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 85, noes 84.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CLOSE OF DEBATE.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that when the House next resolves itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order all debate on the pending section shall close in three minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will confine his motion to the pending amendment. This is a very important section.

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir, on the section; but I will say in ten minutes instead of three minutes. Closing debate will not cut off amendments.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the motion so as to limit debate only on the pending amendment.

The SPEAKER. That amendment is not in order. The rule gives authority to close debate on sections and on amendments pending thereto, and the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] being the larger motion, must be voted down before the vote can be taken on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to a question of order. Was it not the understanding when the House took a recess this afternoon that no business was to be transacted to-night except in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It was not; on the contrary the Chair stated that such an understanding would require unanimous consent.

The question was taken on Mr. SCHENCK's motion; and there were—ayes 44, noes 20; no quorum voting.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] has a proposition to make to the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then I withdraw my motion.

ORDER OF BUSINESS TO-MORROW.

Mr. SCHENCK. I renew the proposition which I made to-day, that the House shall meet at eleven o'clock to-morrow, go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the tax bill immediately after the morning hour, sit until five o'clock, and have no evening session.

There was no objection; and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. No quorum having voted on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to close debate, it is not agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at ten o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until eleven o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio: The petition of Mrs. Vene L. Kennedy, widow of Dr. Lock Kennedy, of Batavia, Ohio, for a pension.

By Mr. CULLOM: The petition of William J. Conkling, in behalf of the one hundred and forty-fifth regiment Illinois volunteers, asking Congress to provide for the payment of the soldiers of said regiment from the date of enlistment.

By Mr. GLOSSBRENNER: The petitions of manufacturers of iron &c., in Cumberland county, Pennsylvania, complaining of the want of efficient protection against the cheaper labor and capital of foreign countries, and praying that Congress will resume consideration of the tariff bill which passed the Senate but failed in the House, March, 1867, for want of time, and enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

Also, a memorial of tobacco and cigar manufacturers and dealers in the various products of tobacco, remonstrating against the proposed change in the internal revenue tax upon tobacco and its manufacturing products.

By Mr. JUDD: The petition of Messrs. Armstrong & Co., and others, asking removal of tax on refined petroleum.

Also, the remonstrance of George Richards and others, against the extension or removal of Howe's patent on sewing-machines.

By Mr. STOKES: The petition of the widow of D. H. Bingham, of Athens, Alabama, praying compensation for forage and other property used by the United States troops during the month of May, 1862.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, June 13, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. MORTON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

CONTRACTORS FOR IRON-CLADS.

Mr. DRAKE. I ask the consent of the body to take up for consideration Senate joint resolution No. 100.

The PRESIDENT, pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent at this time. Is there any objection?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. What is it? Let the title be read for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. The resolution proposed to be taken up is the joint resolution (S.

R. No. 100) for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels of war and steam machinery.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object. That had better wait until the Senate is full.

Mr. DRAKE. I ask the indulgence of the Senate about this matter. I do not wish to press it while the Senate is so thin, and I am perfectly willing, if the Senate will take it up, to give way to other matters until the Senate becomes more full, which it will in the course of the next ten minutes, and I ask the indulgence of the Senate about it. The whole matter was incidentally discussed the other day in connection with the other bill that was presented, and the Senate, I suppose, understands the case perfectly. Gentlemen who are concerned in this matter, who, as has been before stated, have been driven to the verge of bankruptcy, if not to total, complete bankruptcy, by the subject-matters which this bill covers, have been here for months waiting anxiously to learn whether Congress would give them the poor privilege of going into the Court of Claims to see if they could make out a case.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Missouri will allow his motion to pass by until the Senate is fuller, I will move to take up a little bill to which I am sure there will be no objection.

Mr. DRAKE. I beg the honorable Senator from Illinois to allow this joint resolution to be taken up, and then it may be postponed for other matters, if the Senate will so far indulge me.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is the morning business through?

The PRESIDENT, pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the joint resolution indicated by the Senator from Missouri at this time.

Mr. DRAKE. Does it require unanimous consent?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly. We must first go through with the morning business.

The PRESIDENT, pro tempore. Under the new rules it requires unanimous consent until the morning business is through with.

Mr. DRAKE. If the Senate will just let me take it up, I will give way to other business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You can get it up after the morning business is through with.

Mr. DRAKE. I fear I shall not be able to do it then.

The PRESIDENT, pro tempore. Is there any objection to taking up the resolution mentioned by the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir; I object.

The PRESIDENT, pro tempore. Petitions and memorials are in order.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented the petition of Emilie Rossmässler, of Quincy, Illinois, praying the passage of an act of Congress prohibiting the translation of the works of Professor E. A. Rossmässler, deceased, by any person without the consent of his widow, and granting a copyright to her for the publication of the translations of those works; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. HOWE presented the petition of Charles Radcliff, father and heir-at-law of First Lieutenant H. Gansevoort Radcliff, commanding company C, eighteenth regiment United States infantry, praying payment to him of an amount due from the United States to Lieutenant Radcliff at the time of his death; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the memorial of one hundred and twenty residents and citizens of the Territory of Colorado, protesting against the admission into the Union of that Territory as a State under the pending bill, and assigning a number of reasons as their grounds of protest, which, briefly, I will state. They allege that the sparsity of population and consequent small amount of taxable property, taken in connection with the depressed condition of mining affairs, and the high prices necessarily paid for all services, whether official or otherwise, render it impossible for them to support a State government except by taxation, which will be ruinous to all business enterprises. They recite that the plan of admission at present is a scheme which has been in abeyance for three years, and that it is contrary to the wishes of the people for reasons going beyond the mere question of admission. They recite further that at the election at which it was alleged to have been revived, it was treated as a dead and abandoned issue by both political parties, and that no inference is to be drawn from that election favorable to it; and they recite further that the Senators who seek admission are not the choice of the people of the Territory or of any party, and would not be. The bill having been reported, I ask that the remonstrance lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT, pro tempore. That order will be made.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Richard B. Duane, on behalf of Washington Tams, submitted a report, which was ordered to be printed, and asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1069) for the relief of Charles B. Tanner, late first lieutenant sixty-ninth Pennsylvania volunteers, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF PARIS EXPOSITION.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution instructing the committee to inquire into the cost of printing the reports of the Paris Exposition, have had the subject under consideration, and instruct me to report a resolution which I send to the Chair, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That so much of the resolution passed March 19, 1868, as suspends the printing of the report of the commissioner of the United States to the Paris Exposition, be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I have examined this subject since the resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing, and I am of the opinion that if any document should be printed for distribution it is probably wise and proper that this report should be, because I think it will be a benefit to the industrial interests of the country to have the engravings, most of which I understand are mere outlines, that will afford practical facilities for the mechanics and artisans of the country to understand the various products that were exhibited at the Paris Exposition.

But I should like to inquire of the Committee on Printing in reference to a resolution which I had referred to that committee early in the session, in relation to a project by which we were to cease the general publication of documents for distribution, and publish them only at cost for those who might be willing to pay for them. I am desirous that that proposition should be acted upon; but until that principle shall be adopted by Congress, if anything is printed by Congress, I conceive that this is a proper subject to be printed. I desire information in relation to the general policy of the country, as to whether the printing of this mass of useless documents at a vast expense to the country is to be continued or not.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is for Congress to decide. The Committee on Printing agree entirely with the Senator from Vermont that the printing of documents for gratuitous distribution is a great abuse. Although it has been much diminished of late, and the expense of printing for Congress is very much lower in greenbacks than it was formerly in gold, still it is the opinion of the committee that the proposition of the Senator from Vermont ought to be adopted; and we are now preparing such data and information on the subject as will enable us to present it in a form which we hope will meet the approbation of the Senate. In my opinion there should be a few additional copies printed of those publications which are necessary to be placed before us for our own information. Of course the reports of the Executive Departments are of no use to us unless they are printed. Large masses of manuscript referred to a committee cannot receive any attention even in the committee, much less out of it; and when they are printed I think, and I believe my colleagues of the committee agree with me, a few additional copies should be printed and sold at about the cost of publication, or a little less than the cost of publication, for the Government should do something toward distributing that kind of information, and then let it pass into the hands of those who think it of sufficient value to pay for it. My own experience is that whatever a man gets in this world without paying for it is of very little use to him or anybody else.

I am glad that the resolution which I have reported meets the assent of the Senator from Vermont, as it was on his motion the resolution was passed which is to be rescinded. The committee thought that this report was of very great consequence to the industrial interests of the country, and also to the manufacturing and mechanical productions of the country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 541) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid the construction of certain railroads in the State of Wisconsin," approved May 5, 1864; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 542) for the relief of Thomas W. Ward, collector of customs at Corpus Christi, Texas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FOWLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 144) in relation to the erection of a custom-house at Nashville, Tennessee; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PRATT, ARNOLD, AND WALBRIDGE.

Mr. STEWART submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be requested to furnish to the Senate all information in his Department in regard to an alleged contract of Pratt, Arnold & Walbridge for carrying the mail on route No. 15703, between Humboldt City, Nevada, and Boise City, Idaho, and also in regard to services performed by said parties under said contract, together with all other information touching the claim of said parties against the United States.

STATUTE OF LIMITATION AS TO CRIMES.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 509. I think it will take but a few moments to pass it.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire very much to have the Senate take up and act on the bill pertaining to contested elections in this city. I think it ought to be acted on.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The bill which I move to take up is a bill that ought to be acted on, and I think it will take but a moment. I hope there will be no objection to it.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 509) in addition to an act passed March 26, 1864, entitled "An act in addition to an act entitled 'An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States,'" was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill consists of two sections. The Committee on the Judiciary proposed to amend the first section by striking out after the word "committed," in line seven, as follows:

And such indictment may be found within said period, and prosecution, trial, and punishment had thereon in any judicial district of the United States where the offender may be found, or in which any underwriter or owner of such vessel may reside or have his established place of business: Proposed. That nothing herein contained shall prevent the finding of such indictment against any person or persons fleeing from justice after the expiration of said period.

So as to make the section read:

That no person shall be prosecuted, tried, or punished for the capital offenses set forth in the act to which this act is in addition unless the indictment for the same is found by a grand jury within five years after such capital offense is committed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "committed," in line three of the second section, to insert "within three years;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after its passage, and its provisions shall be applicable equally to offenses committed within three years before and offenses committed after its passage.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the chairman explain what this bill means, and who it is for, and so on.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senate desire an explanation about it—I am sure the Senator from Vermont does not, for he knows all about it—it is a bill that was considered in the Committee on the Judiciary. The whole effect of the bill is to extend the time within which men guilty of capital offenses against the United States may be indicted from three years to five years.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the chairman of the committee if it is not intended to meet a particular case?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The bill has its origin probably arising out of the fact that there is a particular case where the limitation will likely expire before proceedings would take place; and that is a very proper reason, I suppose, for calling attention to the law upon that subject and correcting it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

CONTESTED ELECTIONS IN WASHINGTON.

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 534) relating to contested elections in the city of Washington, District of Columbia.

The first section provides that whenever any person has received or shall hereafter receive a certificate from the register of the city of Washington, based upon satisfactory evidence furnished by the commissioners of election, notifying him of his election to any elective office of the city, the person receiving such notification shall be entitled to enter upon the discharge of the duties of his office, and the certificate of the register shall be prima facie evidence of his election to and right to discharge the duties of the office.

The second section provides that any person who shall hinder or obstruct a person holding the certificate of election mentioned in the foregoing section from entering upon or discharging the duties of his office, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof, in any court of competent jurisdiction, shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000, or be imprisoned in the county jail not exceeding six months, or both, in the discretion of the court.

The third section proposes to give the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or any judge thereof, jurisdiction to enforce, by mandamus, or otherwise, the right of any person holding the certificate mentioned in the first section; and the action of the court in relation thereto is to be final.

Under the fourth section any person who claims, or shall hereafter claim, to be elected to any elective office in Washington city, may commence proceedings before the supreme court of the District of Columbia, by petition setting forth the facts upon which he relies, and shall serve a copy on the incumbent or person who has received the certificate of election; and the person so served is to make answer to the petition within five days; and the court is thereupon to try the rights of the parties to the office in a summary manner; and for that purpose a special session is to be called and held whenever necessary for the purposes of such trial; and the decision of the court in any case so brought before it is to be final and conclusive. And when any contest exists in relation to the election of any member of the board of aldermen or common council, the mayor of the city is to appoint all subordinate officers.

An amendment was reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to strike out of the fourth section the following words:

And when any contest exists in relation to the election of any member of the board of aldermen or common council, the mayor of said city is hereby authorized to appoint all subordinate officers.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

And when the legal organization of the board of aldermen or board of common council shall be delayed on account of any contest in relation to the election of any member of either of said boards, the mayor of said city is hereby authorized to make temporary appointments of all subordinate officers, whose appointment or election is authorized by the said mayor and members of said boards under existing laws, to continue until said boards shall be legally organized.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think some explanation of the force and effect of that amendment ought to be made to the Senate.

Mr. HARLAN. It seems to me the amendment explains itself. Under the existing laws subordinate officers in the city of Washington are elected or appointed by the mayor and the members of the boards of aldermen and common council in joint meeting. While these boards are in a disorganized condition it is impossible of course for them to make an election. It may be necessary, however, to have certain of these offices filled during that period, and the amendment is intended to confer on the mayor the authority to make temporary appointments to act during the period of this supposed controversy. The bill as it stood originally authorized the mayor to make permanent appointments, which the committee thought was not proper. They think the law as it now stands is right; but a contingency having arisen when the boards are unable to organize, when it may be necessary that subordinate officers may be appointed, the authority to appoint them temporarily ought to be lodged somewhere, and the committee propose to lodge it in the mayor for the time being.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask the honorable Senator who has charge of this bill if its operation is not to be retrospective. The first clause reads:

That whenever any person has received or shall hereafter receive a certificate from the register of the city of Washington, based upon satisfactory evidence furnished by the commissioners of election, notifying him of his election to any elective office of said city, the person receiving such notification shall be entitled to enter upon the discharge of the duties of his office.

I understand that a corporation election has recently taken place in the city of Washington. I ask the honorable Senator if the effect and object of this bill is not to furnish a new law to regulate and decide that election from what existed at the time the election took place.

Mr. HARLAN. In answer to the Senator's inquiry, I would state that it is intended to provide a law to meet an existing case. There is now no law on the subject, as far as I can discover by examination.

Mr. DAVIS. The explanation of the honorable Senator is just what I conceived it would be. I understand the present law of the District of Columbia to be such that no disputed election can exist which may not be decided in the courts by the law. If I understand the state of the case, there is now pending in this city a disputed election in relation to the mayoralty, and probably other officers. This dispute is about to go to the courts for decision according to the existing laws at the time the election took place. The laws as they existed at the time the election took place are not satisfactory, however, to the majority of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and they are not satisfactory to some of the Radical candidates and claimants for these disputed offices; and the effort and object of this bill is simply to introduce a new law and a new principle of decision for those disputed elections than what existed under the law at the time the elections took place. I do not think that that is a proper system of legislation. When an election takes place in the District it ought to be conducted in conformity with the existing law. If it is not so conducted, and there is any irregularity in the election that would entitle either the one candidate or the other to the office that may be in dispute, the contest ought to be decided between the disputants according to the existing law, and it is not, in my judgment, proper legislation for the Congress of the United States to intervene as the supporters and partisans of one of the candidates in a local election, and to establish a new rule and a new principle by which contested elections shall be decided by the intervention of a new law on the subject.

I am not, to be sure, au fait on the subject of the local laws of the District of Columbia. I never belonged to the Committee on the District of Columbia. The honorable gentleman is chairman of that committee; and I concede that he is much more familiar with and better informed in regard to the laws that regulate these elections and all the affairs of this District and its people than I am. But if I understand the case there are statutes in operation now by which the disputed questions and the disputed rights to office under the recent corporation election may be decided in the courts under the existing laws at the time the elections took place. After the elections have taken place, and when contested elections and contested rights to the offices are raised or about to be raised in the courts, why should the legislation of Congress be invoked and be thrown in favor of one of the contestants against the other?

If I understand aright, there was no law in existence at the time the election took place, and there is none now, that authorized the register to give such a certificate of election as this first section of the bill provides for; but that does not leave the case without a remedy. It is not necessary for the decision of this contested election and of the rights of the parties to it that this bill should pass to enable the register to give such a certificate. The laws as they now exist may be resorted to, and are sufficient to enable the parties in the contest to the offices that are now in dispute to go to the courts to have their rights decided fairly and properly. If I understand this proposition, it is to pass a retroactive law, to control or to regulate in some degree an election that took place under other laws, and to give to one of the parties contestant in the election an advantage and a right which he has not according to the existing law. In other words, the disputed election now has become a judicial question; it is before the courts, or it is about to be taken to the courts; it has passed from the legislative function to the judicial, or is in a state of transitu. It is about to pass from the hustings and the polls to the courts to decide the rights of the parties who were candidates for office; and those rights ought to be passed upon and to be decided according to the laws that were in existence at the time the election took place. One of the parties to this contested election is not satisfied to have the question decided according to the existing law; he comes to Congress; he comes to the Senate; he comes to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and that committee, with partisan haste and zeal, is now concocting bills to change the law which existed at the time the election took place, and by which the rights of the parties ought to be decided, and proposes new legislation to give to one of the contestants an advantage which the existing law did not give him. Sir, I do not believe that any legislation in such a state of contest growing out of an election, to give to one of the parties an advantage, ought to be undertaken by the Senate. I hope, therefore, that this bill will not pass, but will be rejected.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, the honorable Senator who has just taken his seat presents his objection to the bill fairly. I agree with him that no new law ought to be passed, and no amendment of an old law, unless those who present it can give a satisfactory reason for it; and if there is at this time no satisfactory reason for the passage of this bill, I agree with him that the Senate ought not to enact it. The Senator has stated, however, that he is not familiar with the laws as they now exist, and on account of that want of familiarity he has adopted an error, as I think. There is no existing law which will furnish a remedy for the existing case. This, therefore, is intended to be merely a remedial statute, to provide a remedy for an existing case where there is at present no legal means of obtaining relief.

Under the old charter of the city of Washington, which probably still is in force, at least it is the law under which this election was held, the board of aldermen and the board of common council are the judges respectively of the qualifications and election of their own members. I suppose that that would exclude the jurisdiction of the courts, the law providing that the boards shall be the exclusive judges; in that respect adopting the principle of the Constitution as applied to the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States. Usually such a law would be sufficient to provide for the trial of any contested election of a member of either body, but in the existing case this law is inoperative, from the fact that there have been organized two boards of aldermen and two boards of common council, each claiming to have been legally elected under the existing law. The board of common council, I understand, are equally divided; that is, the two organizations have an equal number of members, neither of them has a majority of all; and of course each is as competent to try the legality of the election of the members of the whole board if they were united as the other is. It will appear, therefore, as it seems to me, to every one, that it is utterly impossible for this question to be settled under the law as it exists, there being two organizations, they being equal in number, and neither of them having a majority of the whole; that is, excluding the cases of contest.

This bill proposes that the candidates who received the certificates or notifications of their election from the returning officer under the old law shall be held to be for the time being legally elected, and that any party claiming to be elected adversely to them shall have a remedy summarily before the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or any judge of that court, each one of these judges having the authority, under existing laws in this District, to hold a court, and in this way settle the question of the legality of the election of the members over which this contest has arisen. I suppose that in relation to other officers there may be a remedy under the laws as they exist, but the committee thought it best to make this law general in its provisions. There surely can be no valid objection to trying the validity of the election of any officer, where a contest arises between two candidates each claiming to have been legally elected, before the supreme judiciary of the District. There would be greater prospect of an impartial hearing and decision before the supreme court of the District, as it seems to me and seemed to the committee, than there would be before the judges of election.

The bill, therefore, simply adopts the principle which usually controls. I need not remind every Senator present that this Senate has adopted the rule that an applicant for a seat in this body, holding the evidence of his election shall be held to have been legally elected until the contrary shall be shown; that this shall be regarded as prima facie evidence of his right to a seat; and, usually, members of this body and of the House of Representatives are admitted to their seats on this evidence. The contestant who disputes the right of the claimant to the seat makes his appearance and the question is afterward tried and decided. The bill adopts the principle that is usually applied in such cases, that the party receiving the certificate of election from the register of the city shall be held prima facie to have been legally elected, and then provides an immediate remedy before the supreme court for any party who may claim to have been elected adversely. It was not the intention of any member of the committee to make an unfair law, a law that could be construed to have a party coloring in any way, but to adopt a law which would provide a remedy for the existing case where there seems to be no remedy, and which may be a permanent law for the future.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President—

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The question is on concurring in the Senate with the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAVIS. I will remind the Chair that I know what the subject is before the Senate.

Mr. President, if there is any necessity for this legislation, I should be very far from intervening any objection to it. As I understand the explanation of the Senator from Iowa, the object of this bill is to enable evidence to be manufactured for some of the contestants to these seats that cannot be made under the existing law.

Mr. HARLAN. No. With the Senator's leave, I will say that I have made no such statement. The bill is not for the purpose of manufacturing evidence.

Mr. DAVIS. If I understand the wording of the first section, and if I understand the explanation of the honorable Senator, it is to enable a candidate for office to get a certificate of election which he cannot get under the existing law. The object is to pass a law to enable him to get a certificate of election that shall prima facie entitle him to the office. If that be the purpose and object of the bill, it seems to me evident that it is designed to enable evidence to be manufactured for one of the candidates that cannot be manufactured under the existing law. I so understand it.

This bill was introduced on the 11th of June. The honorable Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] interjected an amendment into this bill late the day before yesterday, I believe. I do not object to that. He is an efficient and enterprising Senator; and that was all well enough. But there is no need of such extraordinary haste. I concede that I am not au fait on the subject of the laws of Congress regulating this District and its affairs; the honorable Senator from Iowa is; and I propose that he let this bill go over until Monday, until I can inform myself in relation to what would be its connection with existing laws and the rights of the parties contested in these litigated elections, and if the legislation proposed to my mind should be reasonable and necessary I will then intervene no objection to it whatever. If it should be of a different character, it will enable me to inform myself in relation to this particular bill, and how it will bear on the other laws that regulate the affairs of the District and its elections and the rights of parties contesting office, and I shall then be ready to make my objection to it. I propose that the honorable Senator consent that it be postponed until Monday, and made the special order, and taken up in the morning hour, or at any time to suit his convenience on that day.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky move to postpone the further consideration of the bill?

Mr. DAVIS. I merely made the suggestion to the courtesy of the honorable Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not a motion.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think this bill ought to be recommitted, and if legislation be necessary at all it ought to be upon a fair principle. It ought not to be in regard to the mayor one way and in regard to the board of councilmen another way. Everybody will see at once that it is not right to say that in regard to the mayor a prima facie case shall stand and in regard to the aldermen a prima facie case shall not stand.

Mr. President, in regard to the recent election in this city, which, of course, everybody knows is the subject of this legislation, although in language it is general, the prima facie case was with the mayor voted for by the Republican or Radical party, but the prima facie case was with the majority of the board of aldermen and board of councilmen voted for by the Democrats and Conservatives of the city. This bill proposes, by a new and ingenious device, that a prima facie case shall be established in favor of the mayor, who shall be put into office and hold his office unless questioned; but in regard to the members of the boards who have the prima facie case that shall not be the rule. If any Senator can say that is right, he has a different view of what is right from mine.

Mr. HARLAN. If the Senator will permit me, I think he is in error in his statement of the fact. The same rule is applied to both.

Mr. HENDRICKS. No, sir. The first section of this bill provides that the certificate of the register shall be conclusive, and then the amendment that is proposed by the committee is to add:

And when the legal organization of the board of aldermen or board of common council shall be delayed on account of any contest in relation to the election of any member of either of said boards, the mayor of said city is hereby authorized to make temporary appointments of all subordinate officers whose appointment or election is authorized by the said mayor and members of said boards under existing laws, to continue until said boards shall be legally organized.

Now, the certificate or declaration or finding of the commissioners of election made at the time the law required it to be made, elected Mr. Bowen as mayor of this city, as I understand the facts. The same certificate or finding and declaration by the boards of election under existing laws elected the Democratic or Conservative members of the two boards in a majority of the cases, especially in the case of the majority in the common council. The result was declared, and the vote showed a majority for the Conservatives in the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth wards, and for the Radicals in the first, second, and third; so that a majority of the Conservatives or Democrats had the prima facie case. I understand—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It becomes the duty of the Chair to arrest the business of the morning hour at this time and notify the Senate that the unfinished business of yesterday is before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to postpone the consideration of the regular order for the purpose of continuing the consideration of this bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not yield for the purpose of that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The business of the morning hour must be arrested at this time, and the Senator from Indiana is speaking on the business of the morning hour. Another measure becomes the order of the day at this hour without any motion.

Mr. BUCKALEW. What is the order of the day?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. BUCKALEW. What is that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The banking bill.

Mr. HARLAN. I make the motion to postpone.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa takes the floor upon the bill that is before the Senate, and moves its present postponement.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust that will not be done, unless it can be laid aside informally. If the Senator can get a vote in a few minutes on his bill I shall not object.

Mr. HARLAN. I have no objection to the regular order being passed over informally until this bill is disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business can be laid aside if there be no objection.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That will be objected to. I think this bill ought to lie over anyhow, until we can have an opportunity to examine it. The printed bill has just been laid on our tables.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana objects, and it can only be done on a vote. The Senator from Iowa moves that the further consideration of the bill which is now regularly before the Senate be postponed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I certainly will not agree to that; but the Senate can do as they please about it. I do not think that a bill of this kind, called up suddenly, for a special purpose, a local purpose, reported only yesterday, ought to displace important public legislation. I do not believe there is any such necessity for hasty action upon a mere matter of local legislation. Indeed I hope the Committee on the District of Columbia will cut this Gordian knot of local authority, and give us a good city government which will control the city and protect property. They can do that, and we can pass a bill of that sort in less time than it will take to pass this bill. Give us a set of good commissioners to manage the affairs of this city, and you will have no more riots or scenes of violence here.

Mr. HARLAN. That is precisely what the committee propose to do by the passage of this bill, to harmonize these conflicts and give the city a good government, a good mayor, and a good board of aldermen and common council. It is the very thing we propose to do by the passage of this bill. The Senator is in error in saying that this is a bill sprung upon the Senate. The bill was introduced a few days ago, referred to the committee, and printed; it was reported back yesterday and laid on the table of every Senator. Personally I care nothing about the passage of the bill. If disorder should arise I can take my chances, I suppose, with the rest in any mob that may take control of the city. But I regard it as my duty as the organ of the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom this bill was referred by the Senate, to call the attention of the Senate to the necessity of immediate action on it. I am not sure that it would be in order now to state more at length the reasons for continuing the consideration of this bill. I hope, however, the Senate will take the view of it I have presented.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The question is on postponing the special order.

Mr. SUMNER. I understand it so. I am in favor of proceeding with the bill of the Senator from Ohio, if we can; but I find myself confronted now with a practical question with reference to the District of Columbia, where we have exclusive jurisdiction. It belongs to us to settle the question. The Senator from Ohio has used a strong expression: he says that he hopes we shall now cut the Gordian knot. Very well; this bill is certainly one step in that direction, if it does not accomplish it, and I believe that for the moment it is the best and most efficient step. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will proceed with this bill which affects the District of Columbia, and finish it to-day. We ought not to take up any other business until this bill is acted on. We must give tranquility and peace to the city government of the District, where we have exclusive jurisdiction.

Mr. HENDRICKS. This bill attracted no attention here until it was reported yesterday. The amendment is printed this morning, and for the first time comes upon our tables. There has been no opportunity for this side of the Senate to consider it. I believe we have no representative upon the Committee on the District of Columbia. The political character of the legislation in regard to the District is known very well to the Senate.

Mr. HARLAN. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that the honorable Senator from Tennessee who sits furthest from me is a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I withdraw what I said.

Mr. HARLAN. I am not sure but that he regards himself as a Republican or Radical, but I have drawn a different inference. The Senator from Indiana perhaps knows better than I do on that subject.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not know that he was on the committee. I thought it was a clean, pure thing. I withdraw what I said on that subject.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. Do I understand the Senator from Iowa as referring to me?

Mr. HARLAN. I remarked that the Senator from Tennessee was a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. That is true; but I understood the Senator to say in addition that I was a Radical. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator misunderstood me. I said that I had supposed that he was not acting with the Republican or Radical party, but that the Senator from Indiana might know better than I did, as he sat nearer the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. HENDRICKS. This bill has just come before us in the shape in which we now find it, and I think that we may ascertain the facts which are intended to be met by this legislation more satisfactorily. It is due to us that it should be postponed until Monday; but if it must be considered now, of course we shall do the best we can. The Gordian knot spoken of by the Senator from Massachusetts can easily enough be cut. If it is intended to do right by this bill, it is a very plain thing what is right. It is right that the men who have a prima facie case under the existing law should hold the office until the prima facie case is set aside on legal investigation and adjudication; and it is not right, whether done in Congress or in a State Legislature, or elsewhere, that you change the evidence establishing the right of a man to an office after his election, and arbitrarily declare that that shall be conclusive upon him. That is right nowhere—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it his duty to remind the Senator that the bill before the Senate is not the bill on which he is speaking. The banking bill is before the Senate, and the question is on postponing that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understand that.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend from Indiana will allow me, I will move to amend the proposition of the Senator from Iowa. As I see it is manifest the Senate are disposed to finish this bill, I will move that the banking bill be postponed until Monday at one o'clock, and made the special order for that hour.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not yield for that purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I give notice that I shall make that motion as soon as I get the floor.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The question now is whether the special order shall be postponed for the purpose of considering the bill in relation to contested elections in the city of Washington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On that question the Senator from Indiana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HENDRICKS. On that question I was responding to the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts. It is probable that I am not in order, and that he was. My remarks were addressed directly to his suggestion that the Gordian knot should be cut. Whether the Gordian knot, as presented by the Senator from Massachusetts, is in order for discussion or not should have been decided by the Chair when the Gordian knot was first presented to the Senate. Now I will stop for the decision of the Chair whether it is proper for us to consider the Gordian knot presented by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, Mr. President—
Mr. HENDRICKS. I have not yielded the floor. I am waiting until the Chair decides the question of order. The Chair has called me to order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair only reminded the Senator of the question before the Senate. It may be that he is in order in replying to any remarks made by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That depends altogether upon whether the remarks were in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under our rules a large latitude of debate is allowed; and a Senator may reply to any remarks made by another, although not strictly in order on the subject before the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am very much obliged to the Chair for permitting me, then, without deciding the point of order, to respond to the question raised by the Senator from Massachusetts. I am aware of the condition of affairs in this city, but the particular facts I do not profess to understand, perhaps, as well as the Senator from Massachusetts. I have not troubled myself to read even the newspaper statements of them, except so far as I have observed them within a few minutes in a paper of yesterday.

Under existing law, the election boards at the close of the election, as I understand, count the votes; they declare the result at each election precinct; they report that result to the register; they report it also to each of the boards of aldermen and common council. The register, under existing law, merely receives that report. He is not a judicial officer to revise that report. He has no power to purge it or to purge the polls. He is to receive the reports of the boards of election as the two city boards receive the reports of the boards of election. So that under existing law the evidence of a man's right to his office depends upon the returns made by the boards of election. Those returns make the election of Mr. Bowen as mayor. Those returns as first made elected the Conservative candidates for the board of alderman and board of common council in four of the seven wards. Now, what does the bill propose? This bill proposes to refer this question to the register. If he has given or shall give a certificate that Mr. Bowen is elected mayor that shall be the evidence. The law governing the election at the time it took place made the report of the boards of election the authority to decide that question. This bill proposes that the certificate of the register shall decide who are elected to the boards in the city, while the law which covered the election, and made the prima facie case under law, made the report of the election boards the evidence. Now, sir, why not apply the plain principle that where, according to those reports, a prima facie case is made, that prima facie case shall stand, and the man having that prima facie case shall go into office and hold office until that prima facie case is overcome by a legal investigation? Is not that right? Who wants it otherwise?

In one of the wards, as I understand the fact to be, the election board declared the result, and made a return in favor of the Conservative candidates, and afterward they revised that, and made another certificate, for a portion of it at least, and excluded the votes of some soldiers, and then declared a different result in that ward. When that election board had counted the votes, declared and made their return as required by law, they had no further power over it. They had no judicial functions authorizing them to revise the election and to say that certain votes ought to be excluded. After they had made their returns, when the returns required by the law had been made, they could not be disturbed except upon a judicial investigation.

Now, sir, what I propose is, that this bill shall be returned to the committee, and that they shall report a bill upon the proposition that the prima facie case shall stand until that prima facie case is set aside upon an inquiry in the courts. That is the law everywhere. What would be thought in one of the States where an election takes place and the certificate of the officers provided by law is made which entitles the party to his office, if afterward the Legislature should provide that another and different officer might issue a certificate and that should make the case? No community would endure that. It would be so palpably wrong that it would not be endured.

Then, sir, it is plain that the prima facie case ought to stand until reversed, and I think the quiet of the city requires it. If illegal votes have been cast, that ought to be decided, not by the register of this city, because he has no means of making the proper investigation, but by the proper court. Whether the courts of this city are clothed with sufficient authority to try a question of this sort I do not know. If they are not, I would very cheerfully concur in proper legislation to give them the jurisdiction. I have no objection to that. Let this question be investigated in the courts; but until that investigation shall take place let the plain, square, and honest rule stand that the men who have the evidence of election as provided by law at the time the election took place take their offices and discharge the duties.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing the order of the day in order to continue the consideration of the bill which has been under consideration in the morning hour.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. When we adjourned last evening the banking bill was under discussion; and I presume it will meet the views of the Senate that that measure shall be postponed until Monday, and be made the special order for that day. I submit that motion.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not think we need postpone it until Monday.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I understand to-day will be consumed.

Mr. POMEROY. It is not at all certain that we shall need the whole day for this bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. There are other measures.

Mr. POMEROY. If any other bill should be taken up to-day and left as the unfinished business, it would take precedence of the special order on Monday.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I make this motion in accordance with a request of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, who has made inquiry about the business of the day. He thinks it is against the general wish of the Senate to take up the banking bill to-day. As that bill is now in order, and may be called for by the chairman, I suppose there will be no objection to the motion I suggest.

Mr. POMEROY. I object to making it a special order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, to postpone Senate bill No. 440 until Monday at one o'clock, and make it the special order for that day. This motion requires a two-thirds vote.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 24, noes 8.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. Here are fifty pension bills just sent to us from the House of Representatives. There are twenty more lying in the committee, making seventy, and there are about eighty on the Calendar. I ask the Senate to give me some day next week for the purpose of taking up these bills. Some of them have been on the Calendar since last February. I ask, if there be no objection to that suggestion, that Tuesday next, after the morning hour, be set aside for the consideration of bills from the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not like to agree to that. I want to ask the attention of the Senate to the legislative appropriation bill on Monday.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I will say Wednesday, if that will be more convenient; and as I have had two days set aside heretofore for these bills and got the benefit of neither, I hope the Senate will stick to me this time. I will say Wednesday.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I take this occasion to give notice that on Monday I shall ask the Senate to consider the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I hope the Senate will agree to the motion which I have made, that Wednesday next, after the morning hour, be set apart for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

CONTESTED ELECTIONS IN WASHINGTON CITY.

Mr. HARLAN. I move now to continue the consideration of the District bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 534) relating to contested elections in the city of Washington, District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer this amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the mayor of the city of Washington shall not hold any other office or place of trust, honor, or profit under the United States in the District of Columbia or elsewhere.

My reason for presenting the amendment is that I understand the mayor-elect is the postmaster of the city, and, in addition to that, is a clerk of the Senate. I have heard it said that he was a sort of omnium gatherum in relation to offices. How many other offices he may hold besides those I have named I am not informed; but, as I suppose, this is piling up the agony rather too high. If he is to be mayor his duties ought to be restricted to that office, and he ought not at the same time to be allowed to hold the office of postmaster of this city and of a clerk in the Senate. I do not know, if he is thus tolerated, how many other offices his voracious maw may take into it under the indulgence of the Senate. I think the amendment ought to prevail.

Mr. HARLAN. I rise merely to correct an error of the honorable Senator from Kentucky. I understand that the present mayor of the city is not an officer of the Senate at this time. He was, I believe, acting as disbursing clerk of the Senate preceding his election to the office of mayor, but on his election to the latter office he resigned the former, and is not now an officer of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. Then the honorable Senator informs us that the mayor has dropped one of his offices. I ask him whether he does not hold on to the other, the postmastership of this city.

Mr. HARLAN. I would state for the information of the Senator from Kentucky, that a change in the post office is completely within the power of the President of the United States and a majority of the Senate of the United States. If in his opinion and that of the President and a majority of this body the two offices are incompatible, the remedy is completely within the control of the political friends of the Senator from Kentucky, if a majority of this Senate approve it.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the honorable Senator if the office of mayor, in its dignity and duties, is not quite enough for one reasonable man? I think, from the Senator's reference to the condition of affairs and of society in this city a short time since, this mayor would have as much as he could possibly do, and do well, to regulate the affairs of the city and to keep in peace and order the population of the city of Washington. I think it is quite reasonable to restrict the mayor to that office. I ask the honorable Senator is there any propriety, any fitness, any proper policy in the mayor of the city of Washington holding at the same time the place of postmaster of the city?

Mr. HARLAN. If the Senator desires my opinion for the purpose of guiding his action, I of course am bound in courtesy to give it.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not want it for any such purpose as that. [Laughter.] I do not permit you to guide my action in any way. I wanted to know if a special appeal upon a principle of reason and justice and propriety, would be acknowledged by the honorable Senator, not to guide my action, but merely to ascertain what his judgment would be upon it.

Mr. HARLAN. Well, Mr. President, I will state that if any gentleman can with propriety hold these two offices at the same time, I have no doubt that the mayor of Washington can. He is a gentleman of very high character, of a high order of talent, high cultivation, and I have discovered no incompatibility in the law, nothing to prohibit the same person holding both these offices; and if any one could with propriety do it I have no doubt the mayor can.

Mr. DAVIS. That is a very good answer. It is rather an admission that no man can with propriety hold the two offices, as I understand it; and if that be the meaning of the honorable Senator, I fully accord with him.

Mr. HENDRICKS. On this question I will ask for the yeas and nays. I should like to know whether it is the judgment of the Senate that the same party should hold more than one office with the emoluments. I think it is a principle that governs throughout this country that an individual should be satisfied with one office.

Mr. NYE. I suppose the objection both by the honorable Senator from Kentucky and the honorable Senator from Indiana to this individual holding two offices, arises from the fact that he is a Republican. I have never understood that there were too many offices for a Democrat to hold if he could only get them; but I submit to the honorable Senator from Kentucky whether it is not better to let one Republican hold two offices than it is to have two Republicans in the two offices. Does not that suit him better?

Mr. DAVIS. A still better rule than that, if the honorable Senator will permit me to respond, is to allow neither of them to hold an office. [Laughter.]

Mr. NYE. That, I suppose, is the truth of the case, both in the mind of the honorable Senator from Kentucky and the honorable Senator from Indiana. I take it for granted, however, that their great leader can correct this evil. He will do anything that they desire. The honorable Senator from Indiana has but to wave his hand and there can be a vacancy in the post office in a minute; and if the honorable Senator from Kentucky would go in person, the Executive, from his neighboring State, would be too happy to relieve Mr. Bowen from that responsibility. Having strong claims on the Executive, I think they have the corrective in their own hands, and it is not best for us to meddle with this matter.

Mr. THAYER. My regard for the President prompts me to appeal to my friend from Indiana and my friend from Kentucky not to press this amendment. The President has it in his power to remove the postmaster if it is incompatible in his view for that gentleman to hold two offices. By pressing this amendment they do in my judgment reflect upon their political leader, the President; and I should regret to see them do it. Therefore, out of regard to the President, I hope the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Indiana will not press this amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not know that the Senator from Nebraska held the views he has just expressed. I thought he regarded the tenure-of-office bill as constitutional and having the legal force of any other law; but I now perceive that he does not believe that law to be constitutional and to have legal force, for the reason that he says the President can turn this man out of the office of postmaster. If the tenure-of-office bill be the law of the land, if it be constitutional, the President has not that power, and the Senator from Nebraska knows it very well. If that be the law, the President of the United States is no longer responsible for the efficiency of the public service—that rests upon the Senate. By that law the President can turn out of office no man who holds office by his appointment with the consent of the Senate, unless the Senate concur in the removal. So that the Senate has voluntarily taken upon itself the responsibility of the efficiency of the executive service, and the Senator from Nebraska cannot say that the President can turn this man out. He cannot do it. No Senator need go to the President and say to him that he can do it, because if he undertakes to do it without the pleasure of the Senate being expressed you say he is liable to impeachment, and you propose to impeach him if he does that which the Senator from Nebraska says he can do.

Mr. President, the reason I have called for the yeas and nays on this question is that I think it ought to be the settled judgment of this country that the same man ought to hold but one office; an important office should receive his entire attention. There is no propriety that we should thus heap upon any man honors and emoluments of office. And I will say to the Senator from Nevada, that in Democratic times it was made the law of the United States, and it still stands upon the statute-book, that the same man shall not receive a salary for more than one office of Executive appointment.

Mr. NYE. More than one Federal office?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly, one Federal office; so that the view of the country as expressed in Democratic times is that one man ought to have but one office; and if you want to pile the honors upon any one man and give him the profits of different offices we shall have the expression of the judgment of the Senate now on this amendment.

Mr. NYE. I simply want to ask the honorable Senator from Indiana, who is au fait upon all these questions of Democratic principles, whether that law was passed in Democratic times and by Democratic votes alone. It has always been the law, I think, ever since I can remember, that a man cannot receive pay for more than one Federal office at the same time. But, now, I want to ask the Senator if there is not the same impropriety in holding two offices that there is in being nominated for two at the same time, taking the chances of two; if the man succeeds in one very well; if he does not, he falls back on the other. Is that quite right? If this amendment is to prevail, should there not be an amendment that no gentleman in this Senate, Democrat or Republican, should be a candidate for nomination to two offices at the same time; for instance, the office of Governor of a State and President of the United States. It seems to me absorbing and against the spirit of the old Democratic law to which the honorable Senator so strictly adheres.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. President, I am one of those who labored under the delusion that the President of the United States had not the right or the authority to remove incumbents of offices without the sanction of the Senate; and I am one of those who also labored under the innocent delusion of believing the tenure of office law constitutional. I believe it to-day. But, sir, my recollection takes me back a couple of weeks since when the Senate declared that the President was not bound by that law. That was the decision, in fact. The Senate declared, by a vote of 19 to 35, that the President had the right to make a removal.

Mr. DAVIS. Do I understand the honorable Senator to acquiesce in that decision?

Mr. THAYER. No, sir; I do not. I most emphatically exercise my private right of condemning that decision, and I as emphatically indorse the decision of the thirty-five who declared that he had not the power to make removals except by the consent of the Senate. But, sir, that decision having been made as it was, I could say to my Democratic friends on this floor who helped to pronounce that verdict of acquittal, that from their standpoint it is unnecessary to make this motion here, because, from their standpoint the President has the right and the power to make the removal. I was speaking for them; and if they will accept my kind offices and good will I will ask them not to put the President in a false position nor reflect upon him by undertaking to pass a motion here which would, in effect, declare that the President did not do his duty.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will ask the Senator a question, with his permission, before he takes his seat, whether he now repeats the proposition that the President has the right to remove the present postmaster of the city of Washington of his own motion? Has he that right?

Mr. THAYER. Without the consent of the Senate?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Has the President that power to remove?

Mr. THAYER. Not according to my view; but if the decision of the Senate on the impeachment case was correct, which I deny, then I should admit that he had the power. But I will say seriously—and I have been serious, as my friend from Indiana has been, all the way through—that if the President deems it incompatible with law or propriety for this officer to hold the office of postmaster of this city while he is mayor, he can send in a nomination of a successor to him in the post office, and give the reasons for making the proposed removal.

Mr. NYE. Allow me to make one statement. It is a well-known fact that the commission of Mr. Bowen as postmaster expired long ago. There is nothing in the law to which the Senator from Indiana alluded to prevent Mr. Johnson from trying to remove him. He is subject to the will of the Executive. His commission having expired, he is only holding on until a successor is appointed. The President is at liberty to try to fill the place at any time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana has called for the yeas and nays upon the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question or two for information. First, I ask him what officer, as the law now stands, has the right to certify as to the result of the vote; and second, I ask him whether there is now, under the law, any provision for which a contested election can be tried, and it can be ascertained what candidate or candidates received a majority of the votes? I should like to know the condition of the law now upon these questions.

Mr. HARLAN. I can answer the Senator best by reading the law in relation to the election of mayor:

"The commissioners hereinafter mentioned shall make out duplicate certificates of the result of the election of mayor, and shall return one to the board of aldermen and the other to the board of common council, on the Monday next ensuing the election; and the person having the greatest number of votes shall be the mayor; but in case two or more persons, highest in vote, shall have an equal number of votes, then it shall be lawful for the board of aldermen and the board of common council to proceed forthwith, by ballot, in joint meeting, to determine the choice between such persons. The mayor shall, on the Monday next ensuing his election, before he enters on the duties of his office, in the presence of the boards of aldermen and common council, in joint meeting, take an oath, to be administered by a justice of the peace, lawfully to execute the duties of his office, to the best of his skill and judgment, without favor or partiality."

Mr. FESSENDEN. What is the provision in regard to ascertaining who are elected aldermen and common councilmen?

Mr. HARLAN. I will read the law on that subject:

"Immediately on closing the polls, the said commissioners for each ward, or a majority of them, shall count the ballots, and make out under their hands and seals a correct return of the persons having the greatest number of legal votes for members of the board of aldermen and for members of the board of common council, respectively, together with the number of votes given to each person voted for; and the persons having the greatest number of votes for the two boards, respectively, shall be duly elected; and, in all cases of an equality of votes, the commissioners shall decide the choice by lot. The said returns shall be delivered on the day succeeding the election, who shall cause the result of the election to be published in some newspaper printed in the city of Washington; a duplicate return shall, together with a list of the persons who voted at such election, also be made on the day succeeding the election, to the register of the city, who shall preserve and record the same, and shall, within two days thereafter, notify the several persons so returned of their election."

It will be seen, therefore, that in the case of the mayor no certificate or notification is given other than the returns of the commissioners of election for each of the wards to the board of aldermen, and also in duplicate to the board of common council, whereupon he is required to take the oath of office and to enter on the discharge of his duties.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Does not the out-going mayor declare the votes for his successor?

Mr. HARLAN. Not at all. The returns are made directly, in duplicate, to the board of aldermen and to the board of common council.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Of the preceding year?

Mr. HARLAN. The existing board of aldermen and councilmen. In the case of aldermen and councilmen it will be seen that it is contemplated that duplicate returns shall be made to the mayor, who may be the out-going mayor, if he should not be reelected, and also to the register of the city, who is made the custodian of the election records, and whose duty it is made to notify each party elected of his election.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Has that not been done in this case?

Mr. HARLAN. It has been done in this case.

Mr. DAVIS. The law read by the honorable Senator, as I understand it, makes no special provision for a contested election.

Mr. HARLAN. There is a succeeding clause which provides that the board of aldermen and the board of common council shall be the judges of the elections and qualifications of their own members, it being, I think, a copy substantially of the provision of the Constitution of the United States relating to the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. DAVIS. I will inquire of the honorable Senator if that clause makes them the final and conclusive judges?

Mr. HARLAN. I think so. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] has the law in his hand.

Mr. DAVIS. I suppose, though, that the matter is left to be governed according to the general rule. If there are two candidates for office, and one of them is installed into the office, and the other believes that he is entitled to it because of having been elected according to the law, the latter has the right to assert his claim to the office in a court unquestionably. I suppose that that general law applies to the election of mayor and aldermen here; but if I am mistaken in that the honorable Senator may readily provide a proper remedy, and that should be a provision to enable a contest between these aldermen, these contesting aldermen or candidates for aldermen, and the contesting candidates for mayor to be brought before a court and to be decided upon the facts according to the law in force at the time the election took place. What objection can there be, if any legislation be needed upon the subject, to that course, I ask the honorable Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HARLAN. The committee attempted to provide the very remedy. If the Senator from Kentucky will allow me, I will read from the fourth section of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I have read it. But why intervene other remedies? Why not leave the parties to their prima facie and final rights under the law just as the law existed when the election took place, and let this provision for a judgment as to the rights of contestants before the courts go into operation with the officers holding their respective offices according to their returns, as the law existed at the time the election took place?

Mr. HARLAN. I attempted to explain that a few minutes since. The law as it now stands provides, as to the board of aldermen and the board of common council, that "each board shall judge of the legality of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and shall supply vacancies in its own body," &c. I find in the law no other mode of trial except a trial by the board itself of the qualifications and elections of its own members.

Mr. DAVIS. This is the suggestion which I make to the honorable Senator, that his bill shall simply provide for the decision by the courts of the rights of the different claimants to this office; let the mayor go into his office under his return as the law existed at the time the election took place; let the aldermen go into office on the prima facie returns just as the law regulated the returns of the election at the time the election took place; and let this bill simply provide that if the candidate who is not inducted into the office of mayor believes that he is entitled to the office, there shall be a remedy for that candidate who believes he was elected but who did not get the return to enable him to contest his right in court. At the same time, let the bill provide that the aldermen who received returns of their election according to the law in existence when the election took place shall go into office; let it further provide that the candidates who contest the right of those aldermen to their seats shall have a remedy in court to decide which has the better right.

That would be even-handed justice between these parties. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] stated clearly and distinctly that here was a proposition to establish a different rule for the induction of those candidates into the different offices. In the one case, it is proposed to induct the mayor on the returns made by the officers whose duty it was to make returns of his election under the law as it existed at the time of the election. Nobody objects to that. As I understand, the Republican mayor has received such a majority, and he has been inducted into office. If the opposing candidate desires to contest his right to the office, let the honorable Senator's bill provide a remedy that will enable the contesting candidate to make the issue in court, and that will allow the mayor who received the returns to remain in the office and execute it until that contest is decided in court. So of the aldermen. As I understand, a portion of the aldermen have received their returns according to the law as it existed when the election took place. Let them go into office and take upon themselves the exercise of its duties just as the mayor did upon the returns of the proper officers of the election; and if the opposing candidates believe that they are entitled to the office, and that those men in whose favor the returns were made are not entitled to the office, let the honorable Senator's bill provide that the men who did not get the returns, but who claim the office, shall contest their right in court just as a contestant of the mayor is authorized to assert his claims in court.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, as I do not intend to vote for this amendment, I will state in a word my reasons. The facts seem to have been misunderstood. Mr. Bowen was called into the office of the Secretary of the Senate, as I happen to know, for a temporary purpose in connection with the investigation into the accounts of the late Secretary, with no design or desire of remaining here, and he actually left after the particular duty that he had undertaken was discharged. As to this matter of his holding the office of postmaster, the explanation already made is satisfactory. His term of office expired, I understand, in March, and he is holding custody of the office and managing it until the President and Senate can select his successor. The reason, I believe, for delay in selecting a successor has been the difficulty of the President, among the very large number of applicants, to fix his mind upon any one person. There is therefore some delay in sending a name in.

I am reluctant to vote for this amendment saying that the mayor of Washington shall not hold two offices, when in point of fact he is not holding under any regular term, and it is not his purpose or desire to hold the postmastership longer than the President permits him pro tempore to discharge its duties until a successor be appointed. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. HARLAN. I merely wish to remark, in reply to the observations of the Senator from Kentucky, that the bill pending was intended to provide, and I think does provide, precisely the remedy which he so clearly describes. It provides that the aldermen and councilmen who hold the certificate of election shall be permitted to enter on the discharge of the duties of their offices; that that certificate shall be held to be prima facie evidence of their right to hold; and the fourth section of the bill provides that any party deeming himself to have been elected adversely to this may appear in the supreme court of the District of Columbia and contest the right of those thus sworn in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. DAVIS. I believe the yeas and nays have not been ordered on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They have been ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. With the consent of the Senate, then, after the explanation of the Senator from Pennsylvania, I ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The call for the yeas and nays will be withdrawn unless objected to. The Chair hears no objection; and now the Senator withdraws his amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. Now, in lieu of that amendment I will offer this:

And be it further enacted, That the mayor of the city of Washington shall not receive the pay or emoluments of any other office.

I will say a single word in support of this proposition. The honorable Senator from Nevada, [Mr. Nye,] who always speaks with so much force and with so much instruction to the Senate, was formerly a Democrat himself, if I understand his political history. I think that he and his ancient Democratic friend, the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. Hendricks,] may come to a proper and correct understanding of what the principle is that was adopted by the Democratic party some years ago in connection with this subject. It was not that the same man should not hold two offices, but it was that the same man should not receive a salary for two offices. We have an example at this time.

The Secretary of the Interior is acting as Attorney General ad interim, as I understand. The principle established by the Democratic party is that a man who is an officer of the Government, and whose whole time and services are presumed to be due to the Government and to the country for the salary that he receives in one office, shall not be permitted to receive a salary in another or two other offices. That I understand to be the principle, and I suppose it is a very proper principle, at least it has been sustained by the Senate and I believe by the House of Representatives at the present session of Congress. The Committee on Claims have had presented to them and have considered various claims in cases where officers of the Government receiving a fixed salary were called upon pro tempore or ad interim to perform the duties of other offices. They have asked for compensation for the performance of the duties of the other offices to which they were thus temporarily assigned. Their claims for such compensation have been referred to the Committee on Claims, and that committee of the Senate I know has unanimously decided against all such claims for the compensation of an office in addition to the compensation of another office which was fixed by law to the person who was performing temporarily the duties of a second office. I just propose, by this amendment, to apply that principle.

Mr. Bowen holds on to his office of postmaster, as my honorable friend from Nebraska contends, and as the majority of the Senate also contend, until his successor is nominated to the Senate and confirmed by the majority of the Senate. I want the provision which I now offer to meet exactly that case and all other cases, whether of Mr. Bowen or anybody else; so that when he is postmaster of the city of Washington, under the Government of the United States, and is receiving a fixed salary or a salary partly fixed and partly by commissions, or wholly in the one or the other form, payable from the Treasury of the United States, he shall not be allowed at the same time to receive pay as mayor of Washington. I hope the principle of that amendment will meet the approval of my friend the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like very much to get at the exact state of the facts before I can vote intelligently on this subject. I do not know that I understand what the facts of the case are. I have understood them to be as I will state them, and I will ask the honorable Senator from Iowa if my understanding is correct.

It is the business of the commissioners of election, as they are called, to receive and return the votes polled. They are mere receiving officers. There is a registry of this city, a list is made out, and the persons whose names are on the list are entitled to vote. The commissioners, as I understand it, are to receive the votes according to the list, and make a return of the votes. They did so in this case, received the votes and made their return; but the next day they undertook to purge the list and make a new return, having assumed to strike out a certain number of votes as having been thrown illegally, thus making themselves judges of the legality of the voting. On that second return, or amended return, the register issued his notices of election, and this bill confirms those notices so far as the prima facie case is concerned. Is that the state of the facts?

Mr. HARLAN. The facts, in the order in which they arise, are these: first, a registry was made, as the Senator has stated, of the voters, of those who were supposed to be entitled to vote; and, of course, afterward the election occurred under that registry; but between the time of making that registry and the holding of the election Congress passed a law defining the qualifications of voters, providing among other things—

"That said section"—

referring to a section of the law as to the right of voting—

"shall not be construed as conferring the elective franchise in said city on non-commissioned officers, soldiers, sailors, or marines, in the regular service of the United States, situated or on duty in said city, except such as may have become actual residents, with their families, in said city for one year previous to any election."

This law was enacted defining those qualifications of electors after the registry was made, and before the votes were taken. On the day of the election, in the fifth ward, and perhaps in other wards, soldiers connected with some of the regiments—I think chiefly the twelfth infantry—who had been previously registered, presented themselves as voters and claimed the right to vote. The judges of the election received their votes, but marked the votes and checked them, believing them not to be legal voters. When the election was concluded, as I understand, the whole result was first certified up to the mayor; but on a close examination of the vote in the ward to which I have referred, it was ascertained that these votes would change the result of the election in that ward. The commissioners therefore made a careful count of these votes of soldiers who had not been residing in the city a year, and who were not therefore legal voters under this law, and attached the affidavits of ten of the officers of that ward, being two thirds, there being fifteen in all, and certified that up to the register with the whole return.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And to the mayor, at the same time?

Mr. HARLAN. No; I think the certificate to the mayor was made first, but I am not sure about that. This, at all events, was certified up to the register of the city, and receiving this return from the election officers of the fifth ward, in which they swore that a certain number of voters whose votes had been received, indicating them, were not legal voters who had cast their votes for certain candidates, the register of the city made out his notification to the parties who were duly elected according to this certified statement of the election officers.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator for information a question. Is the vote in this city by ballot, and if so, how did anybody know how those parties voted? Certain votes are excluded. I want to know how anybody knew that those voters voted for this candidate or the other candidate in that sort of a transaction that he is describing.

Mr. HARLAN. It was the easiest matter in the world to ascertain that by checking the ballot and checking the check list, which I understand was done.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Was the ballot checked?

Mr. HARLAN. I understand so. Believing that the party presenting himself was not a legal voter under the law, they received the ballot, but marked it, and also marked the check list of registered voters.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Was there any authority of law for those officers to do that?

Mr. HARLAN. I am not able to answer that question. I am not sure what the regulation is on that subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa another question. Are the persons who make out the list and the commissioners who are appointed to receive the ballots the same board, consisting of the same persons, or are they different?

Mr. HARLAN. They are different officers.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What power, then, had the commissioners, who are merely to receive the votes of men on the check list, to do anything but receive them? How could they go behind the check list and assume to mark ballots and mark lists? What had they to do except receive the votes and certify the votes received?

Mr. HOWE. I cannot answer that question, perhaps, as well as the Senator from Iowa can; but it seems to me another question is quite as pertinent as that; and that is what law there is to prohibit these canvassers or these commissioners of election or anybody else who sees a ballot put in to put a mark upon it to identify that particular ballot, so that when it is opened he may know who threw that ballot, as the face of the ballot will show whom it is for?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The answer to that is that introducing any such principle interferes entirely with the freedom of election by ballot.

It is never known, in any place I ever heard of, that those receiving the votes exercise any such power.

Mr. HOWE. If there was a law protecting the freedom of election to that extent, then this act was a violation of that law; but if there was none, I take it it would be interfering with the freedom of the action of the commissioners to prohibit them from doing it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I can only say that in my own State and all other States that I ever heard of, where there was a registry of votes made out by a certain class of officers appointed for that special purpose, their list is conclusive and the votes of those persons are to be received; and the power which those who receive the votes, the commissioners of election, have, is simply to receive the votes of those persons and to see that no other persons than those on the list vote. They have no power whatever except to receive and count and return the votes.

Mr. RAMSEY. Allow me to suggest that in some of the western States the officers of election number the tickets as they are put into the box, and put the same number upon the name of the vote on the check list.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If that is so provided for by law, it can be done.

Mr. RAMSEY. It is by law.

Mr. HOWE. I take it there are no election laws anywhere in any State framed for the purpose of preventing an investigation as to the actual result, the true result of any election. That is always, under the election codes of all States that I know anything about, a subject for investigation, and some tribunal is authorized to go behind the returns and ascertain the fact.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The law here says the board of aldermen and board of common council shall do it.

Mr. HOWE. As the law now stands in reference to the election of aldermen, the tribunal is the board of aldermen; and in reference to the election of common councilmen, it is the board of common council, as I understand. That is the tribunal. Now, here is a bill to give an appellate jurisdiction, an appeal from the decision of those boards, and, I take it, it is competent for the national Legislature to provide such an appeal; but wherever that tribunal is, it has this power of determining, if the evidence exists anywhere, no matter what you may say about the freedom of election, how every man voted. That evidence is not always attainable, but in almost all elections it is attainable, and perhaps in all it is. Certainly it is in a city of this kind, for you may put over every single voter whose name is on the check-list upon the stand and make him swear how he voted. But if the ballot be marked so that the commissioners of election can determine by a number on it or a mark on it whether that ballot was thrown by Mr. Brown or Mr. Jones, then the commissioners of election, when they open the ballot and see whom it is given for, will know just as well whom Mr. Brown and Mr. Jones voted for as they did themselves, and they can make that proof which, independent of this mark, Mr. Brown and Mr. Jones would have to do before the tribunal. So that I see nothing in this bill or nothing in the conduct of the commissioners of election which interferes with the freedom of election, as we understand it. There is no freedom of elections which sanctions the vote of a man whom the law prohibits from voting, and there should be none to that extent. All there is in this bill, it seems to me, that is anomalous at all, is the fact that it provides an appeal from an adjudication which, prior to the passage of this bill, was conclusive. I do not think there was anything very wrong in that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Wisconsin has evidently mistaken this bill. The first section of this bill provides that the register's certificate in the existing case, in this case by a law passed after the fact, shall be conclusive as to the prima facie right. That is the provision. There is no fault found with the provision in the fourth section that there may be an appeal to the courts.

Now, let us look at the operation of it. I am not saying that it may not be all right enough; but I want to get at the exact facts. Here these commissioners of election, whose duty is simply to receive the votes of those whose names are on the list, undertake to check the votes of certain persons, and to ascertain how they voted. When they make their return, and their only business according to law is to return the actual number of votes thrown, instead of doing that, they assume to be judges, to a certain extent, of the election, and they mark a certain number of ballots and return that a certain number of ballots thus marked were thrown by soldiers; and then the register, instead of taking the whole return which gives the prima facie right to seats to one set of men, undertakes to throw out the ballots thus marked and thus give the prima facie right to seats to another set of men, and issues his notices accordingly. That is the fact about it, and this legislation proposes to make that decision of the register conclusive as to the prima facie right to the seats, thus taking perhaps the organization of the boards out of the hands of one set of men, and putting it into the hands of another set of men. That is the effect.

Now, the Senator says there is nothing wrong in marking these votes, and there is no law against it. Is there not? I thought the idea of the ballot was that every man should vote independently, and secretly if he chose to do so, and not have anybody know how he voted. I have always understood that to be the doctrine of the ballot. Why not vote viva voce? Because then every one knows how every man votes. The idea of the ballot is that a man may vote without having it known, unless he chooses to have it known by showing his ballot for whom he votes; that he shall not be subjected to other influences. If you may mark the soldier's vote, you may mark my vote if I am a resident in the ward and have been there twenty years, you may mark the vote of every man, no matter who he is whose name is borne on the check list, and you may thus publish to the world, what the voters may not choose to have known, how every man voted in the election. I say that course of proceeding is a palpable violation of the whole doctrine and idea of the vote by ballot, which is that a man may vote freely and have nobody to overlook him.

The Senator says that possibly men may have voted who had not the right to vote. There is a remedy for that. The board of aldermen, who are to decide this question when it comes before them, on looking over the list, if a remonstrance is made, or if a remonstrance is not made of their own motion, may find certain names which they have reason to believe are not the names of legal voters, persons who did not come within the law, and ought not to have been allowed to vote. They have the power, in that case, to call those voters before them, or to take any other evidence that may exist, and find out, if they can, how those men voted, and thus purge the list so as to get rid of all illegal votes. That is the way in which it is done, and the way in which it ought to be done; and the idea that a man simply appointed to receive votes, and receive votes that are on the check list given him by proper authority, saying, "Sir, you will receive the votes of these men and no others," has a right to mark the ballot of any man when it is thrown, and then to open it and return it as questionable, is a new idea to me with regard to proceedings of this kind. I say again, if that doctrine is to prevail you destroy the secrecy of the ballot. You do not help it by saying that the commissioners think that certain men may be illegal voters, may not have a right to vote. That is a matter with which they have no concern. If they can mark the vote of one man they may mark the vote of every man, and the result is that the ballot amounts to nothing but a viva voce vote.

Sir, I do not hold to any such doctrine as that. I do not know but that I may vote for the section under the circumstances; I may or I may not; but I am simply wanting to get out the facts so that the Senate shall understand them and the principle upon which this bill is founded.

Mr. CORBETT. My idea of judges of election is that they are appointed to inspect the votes as they are offered; that they are to judge who have the right to vote under the law; and if they are in doubt as to the right of any individual, the judges being usually composed of half of each of the opposing parties—half Democrats and half Republicans—

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will allow me to tell him that in regard to these parties, they are not judges; they are merely ministerial officers to receive the votes. The judges of who shall vote are the men who make out the list originally of the voters. When they make that list they judge who shall be put upon it. These commissioners of election are nothing but ministerial officers to receive the votes of men whose names are on the check list, and no more. They have no power to judge at all.

Mr. CORBETT. They are chosen, I think, from the two political parties, as a usual thing.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That depends upon the law in each particular place. How it is in this place I do not know; it may be so in some places.

Mr. CORBETT. I do not know exactly how it is here, and that is what I wish to understand. I know it is so in our city—the judges receive the votes of those who they agree are entitled to vote; and if they are in doubt as to the right of a person who offers to vote they check the vote and check his name, so that if afterward on examination they find that the man is not entitled to vote they may exclude his ballot; if he has a right to vote, they count it. I do not see why that might not be done here by agreement between these judges.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The honorable Senator from Oregon will allow me to suggest to him that it is barely possible that the law of Oregon does not prevail everywhere else.

Mr. CORBETT. That is true.

Mr. FESSENDEN. His argument applies to this case if that law prevails here, and if it does not it does not apply.

Mr. CORBETT. I should like to have the law stated with regard to the manner in which these votes are cast, if the Senator from Maine can inform me.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know. The Senator from Iowa can probably give the information.

Mr. HARLAN. My attention was absorbed with another matter at the moment, and I did not hear the Senator's inquiry.

Mr. CORBETT. I should like to know whether these judges or commissioners are to judge as to the right of individuals to vote when these votes are offered, whether they have any right to judge at all under the law of the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARLAN. That is a disputed question. At the election one year since, the judges excluded certain colored men from voting, and the Republicans at that time held that they did it illegally; that they were wrongfully excluded, although the judges maintained that they were not residents of the District. The question, as far as I know, has never been settled whether they have a right to exclude a man whom they know to be an illegal voter or not. But I will read the oath which, I understand, the officers take previously to entering upon the discharge of their duties as commissioners:

"The said commissioners shall, before they receive any ballot, severally take an oath or affirmation, to be administered by some justice of the peace for the county of Washington, truly and faithfully to receive and return the votes of such persons as are by law entitled to vote for members of the board of aldermen and board of common council in their respective wards, according to the best of their judgment and understanding; and not knowingly to receive or return the vote of any person who is not legally entitled to the same.' The polls shall be opened at ten o'clock in the morning and be closed at seven o'clock in the evening of the same day. Immediately on closing the polls the said commissioners for each ward, or a majority of them, shall count the ballots, and make out under their hands and seals a correct return of the persons having the greatest number of legal votes for members of the board of aldermen and for members of the board of common council respectively."

Mr. CORBETT. It seems to me that that constitutes the board judges of the election, though they are named commissioners.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Was not that law passed before the registry law? Has not the registry law been passed since?

Mr. HARLAN. It has been.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That varies all that.

Mr. HARLAN. I understand, by inquiry from the mayor-elect, that this is the oath still administered to these officers.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That may be; but the registry law makes other men judges of the qualifications of the electors.

Mr. CORBETT. How are these commissioners appointed?

Mr. HARLAN. They are appointed by the supreme court of the District.

Mr. HOWE. I desire to make a few remarks in reply to the argument submitted by the Senator from Maine. I am disposed to try this question, not upon the laws of Oregon or of Maine, but upon the laws prevailing here in the District of Columbia, so far as I understand what those laws are; and I will not, for the purpose of what I have to say this morning, raise the question whether the form of the oath just read here as prescribed to the commissioners of election constitutes them judges of election, or vests in them any discretion over the question as to who may or who may not vote; but I will assume that they have a mere ministerial function, and that the duty prescribed to them by law is simply the duty of taking the ballots from the individuals whose names are borne upon the registry. I will assume that this is the only duty prescribed to them by law. But that that is the only labor they may perform, or the only duty with which they may charge themselves in reference to the election, I do not concede. I think they may go further than that. I think they may do any one and every single act with a view to secure a fair and full expression of the legal voters in the ward or in the city which the law does not prohibit them from discharging. It is upon that point, if upon any, that I am at issue with the Senator from Maine.

He assumes that for them to undertake to know how an individual votes whose right to vote they deny, but have not the authority to determine under the law, is a violation of the secrecy and privacy and sacredness with which the law shelters this right to vote. Now, I think he assumes more than the law declares. The law has simply provided that the electors shall vote by ballot; but if in providing that they might vote by ballot it was the purpose of the law to provide that the way in which they voted should never be known, that the individual for whom they voted should never be known to the public, then it was necessary not only to prohibit the commissioners from putting any mark on the ballot, or taking any cognizance of the way in which the individual voted, but it was necessary for the law to prohibit any judicial investigation as to how they voted. It was just as important to prohibit the board of aldermen from calling one of these soldiers before them to make him swear how he voted as it was to prohibit the marking of his ballot when it was received.

But I assume that the law did not intend to cover with the veil of secrecy this fact because it has not done so; it has not prohibited the commissioners from marking the ballot; it has not prohibited the board of aldermen from making the individual swear how he voted. And because it has not done any of these things, but has simply authorized him to put the name of his candidate upon a piece of paper, instead of declaring it at the polls, I assume that it was the purpose of the law only to protect the vote from public knowledge so far as that single act would tend to protect it and no further, leaving to all other tribunals, judicial and legislative, every other means of determining these two facts: first, whether a man voted who had not a right to vote; and, secondly, how that man did vote, how his vote influenced the election. Both of these facts must be known in order to secure a fair result to the election.

Now, sir, as recited here, the facts in this case seem to be that these commissioners, who, the Senator argues, had a mere ministerial duty—and they seem to have regarded such to be their duty themselves—took the votes of men whose names they found on the registry, and yet who, they believed, were not authorized to vote. Holding that they had not the authority, under the law as it stood, to exclude them, they received the ballots; but it seems they did put a mark upon them, so that they could identify the ballots. It turns out that they were right in their suspicions, that these men had not the right to vote, that the law clearly prohibited them from voting. But I understand that as the law is to-day, the only tribunal which can determine the right of these individuals to vote is the board of aldermen and the board of common councilmen, and I suppose that their adjudication has been in favor of the right instead of against it.

Mr. HARLAN. That the Senator may know the exact facts, I will state that the Conservative members, as they are called, hold that one set of officers were elected in that ward, and the Republican members hold that another set were elected, and they have organized separately, and have two boards of common councilmen and two boards of aldermen.

Mr. HOWE. That makes it a little more mixed; but I am assuming that the whole board of aldermen has decided that these soldiers that your law prohibited from voting had a right to vote, and that they put the law under their feet. I do not care whether it is a minority, or a majority, or the whole board who have done it. The question is whether the supreme authority of the nation stands concluded by that adjudication, no matter how many partook in it. I say it was a fraud. If the voting of the soldiers was a fraud on the law, the adjudication of the aldermen in determining that they had a right to vote was a sanction of that fraud; and if that adjudication had been made by the supreme court of the District it would still have been another sanction of the fraud; and if it had been made by the Supreme Court of the United States it would still be a sanction of the fraud, and if it were made by the Congress of the United States it would be only another sanction of the fraud.

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask the honorable Senator a question, with his permission.

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. If a soldier resides in the city of Washington, is he not entitled to vote here?

Mr. HOWE. The law as it stands gives him a right to vote if he has had a residence of a year here, with his family, before the election. But I understand—I am not trying the case myself; I am speaking on the statements made here—I understand that soldiers who had not resided here a day, never had a residence here except as members of a regiment, went to the polls and voted.

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask the honorable Senator another question, with his permission, first stating that I have understood the fact to be different from the statement he has just made, though he may be right. He admits that the officers of this election marked some of the ballots.

Mr. HOWE. I understand it to be so.

Mr. DAVIS. Had they not as much right to indorse the name of the man who deposited a ballot upon the ballot as to mark it?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. Had they the right to do either?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir; they had a right to do both, simply because the law did not prohibit them from doing either.

Mr. DAVIS. That would not be a secret ballot.

Mr. HOWE. I say the law does not provide for a secret ballot; it provides for a ballot. If it provided for a secret ballot it would require your ballot-boxes to be deposited away from human supervision, where a man could go to it alone out of sight of the rest of the world and there put his piece of paper in. The law does not provide for a secret ballot; it provides for a ballot, and at the same time the law provides that the proper tribunals may know for whom that ballot was given, and every ballot.

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask the honorable Senator if the law provides for an open ballot?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir; it provides for a ballot.

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask the honorable Senator if putting the voter's name on the ballot would not make it an open ballot?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir; not necessarily an open ballot. An open ballot is a ballot which is open and displayed, as I understand it; but I do not understand that the law prohibits an open ballot. A man has a perfect right to go to the polls with an open ballot and put it in. I do not know that the commissioners would be authorized—for I have not seen the full law—having taken the ballot to open it, and yet, unless there is something in the law which prohibits them, they would have the undoubted right to do that thing.

Mr. HENDRICKS. To examine and read it?

Mr. HOWE. To open the ballot, unless the law prohibits the opening of it. I do not know how you would punish them for doing it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then they have the right to make a record of the vote cast and how it was cast, as evidence?

Mr. HOWE. Just as good a right to make it as the board of aldermen would have to make it; just as a good a right to make it as the supreme court of this District would have if you give them appellate jurisdiction; just as good a right to do it as any tribunal which assumes to bring a man before it and make him swear how he voted. They make up a record and publish it to the world. Why? They do it in order to determine whether the law has been observed at the election or not.

Now, as I was trying to say, I understand that certain men did come to the polls, whom the law forbade to do so, and cast these votes. I understand that the tribunal with whom rests now the jurisdiction to try and determine their right to vote has affirmed their right to vote; and the question is, shall we stand concluded by that judgment, or shall we provide by an exercise of legislative authority for a new trial, another trial, an appellate trial of that question? I think if there is any reason to believe that this injustice, this outrage upon the law has been perpetrated, it is our bounden duty, our most solemn duty to provide some tribunal to retry and readjudicate the question.

But the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] says that this bill now pending makes the certificate of the register prima facie evidence of the right to hold the office pending the litigation. I understand that is the effect of it. What is there wrong about that? Is it not as fair for the law to base the prima facie right on the certificate of the register as on the return of the commissioners of election or as upon the adjudication of the board of aldermen? It is the province of the Legislature to say what shall or shall not constitute the prima facie right, and to say what shall be evidence of the prima facie right.

Mr. HARLAN. If it will not be an interruption of the Senator, I have the law now on one of the points that he has been discussing, and will read it. It is section seven of the act of January 8, 1867:

"That the officers presiding at any election shall keep and use the check-list herein required at the polls during the election of all officers, and no vote shall be received unless delivered by the voter in person, and not until the presiding officer has had opportunity to be satisfied of his identity, and shall find his name on the list, and mark it, and ascertain that his vote is single."

Mr. FESSENDEN. That shows it exactly; that is all he can do.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator says that shows it exactly, and that is all he can do. That is all the law charges him with the duty of doing; but I say he could have done several things beside that, and undoubtedly did do, on the very day of election, some having reference to the fairness of the election, and some having no reference to it whatever. I say he could do anything which the law did not prohibit him from doing.

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask my friend a question with his permission. If the law as it stood at the time the election took place authorized one officer to make the return of the election, is it within the competence or within the propriety of Congress to pass a subsequent law authorizing another officer to make a return of the election?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. DAVIS. After the return has been made by one officer, then there is an appeal to Congress to select another officer to make a different return?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, Mr. President, the law could authorize all the people in the District of Columbia to make a return, and each one could make a perfect return, I take it. I do not see any necessity for doing anything of that sort. The question is, after all, and it is the only question, whether the steps taken in this election are final steps, are adjudications which bind all the people of the District, all the candidates who were voted for, and bind the tribunals of the country. If they were final adjudications, that is the end of litigation. If they were not, then it is perfectly competent for the legislative authority to furnish new trials as long as in its discretion it thinks justice can be promoted by new trials—a new trial by the supreme court of the District, and another one by the Supreme Court of the United States if they see fit to do so.

Mr. President, I have said perhaps more than I had need of doing.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I only wish to comment a little on two points made by the Senator from Wisconsin, leaving the others to take care of themselves. The first is an admission which he makes which covers the whole ground I assumed, and that is, he says this voting by ballot, receiving votes, is only intended to protect the secrecy of the ballot so far as that act is concerned, to use his own language. That I agree to, and that is all I have been contending for. I admit with him that all this matter of balloting can be revised and reviewed by the competent and proper tribunal which is finally to pass upon the fact of election. What I contended for was that the very idea of voting by ballot is founded upon the idea of secrecy; that every man should be at liberty to vote in such a manner as not to have his vote known, if he saw fit to do so. That it may be discovered afterward by any particular judicial course marked out to establish the fact whether A or B was elected is no doubt necessary; but so far as the act is concerned, as the Senator calls it, I contend that he has the right to vote, if he has complied with the other requisites, without having those who receive the vote ascertain how he votes. If they can mark his ballot we may just as well have the open vive voce vote in the English fashion. Our fashion is as I have stated it, and for the reason that I have given. It is founded on the idea of secrecy; that a man's vote should not be open to the supervision of everybody about him, of those who receive his vote even, that he may be perfectly free and independent in the act. That is the idea of it; and the Senator concedes it so far as the act is concerned, he says; and that is as far as I go.

Now, sir, as to the Senator's other legal idea, that a ministerial officer may do anything that is not prohibited to him, that is a new legal principle. I had always been educated in the idea that a ministerial officer could do just what the law pointed out to him to do, and nothing more. But the Senator says if certain duties are given to a ministerial officer he need not confine himself to those duties, but anything else that suggests itself to his discretion, his idea of what may be right and proper is open to him, if not prohibited by law. Why, sir, that would upset all the rules of judging of the acts of ministerial officers. The honorable Senator is a learned lawyer. He has been upon the bench. Did he ever hear of a certain maxim, "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius?"

Mr. HOWE. I can translate that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I know the Senator can translate that. I supposed it was a well known maxim, and particularly applicable to ministerial officers, that if certain duties defined by law are devolved upon a certain set of men those duties they can perform, and none others, in relation to that act, legally. They cannot go beyond them.

Now, what does the seventh section of the law passed only last year, read by the honorable Senator from Iowa, say? Simply this: that these commissioners of election may receive the votes of all those persons whose names are borne upon the check lists, as they are called or whatever they are called, and that they may examine them so far as to ascertain the identity of the individual, and that he has a right to vote; and there it stops.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. Suppose the question is whether these commissioners of election could do anything which the law did not instruct them to do in reference to this election. Suppose it to be an established fact that they did open the ballot, the ballot which Brown put in, and see that he voted for Bowen, and afterward come on the stand and swore to it, what is the court going to say about it? Are they going to receive their evidence, or not? And if the court receives that evidence, what is going to be done with the commissioners?

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is no doubt about that. That is a question I am not discussing, what is to be done with the commissioner. A great many things may be done which are wrong. I am discussing the propriety of the thing, and the Senator is maintaining the propriety of the thing, that they had the right to do it, and it was all proper, or else his argument amounts to nothing.

Mr. BUCKALEW. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that in Pennsylvania the offense is indictable, and there are a great many penalties for not merely peeping into the ballot, but for meddling with it in any way. We understand that those laws are simply a sanction to the general principle of the secrecy of the ballot.

Mr. HOWE. I simply want to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania what the Senator from Maine said to the Senator from Oregon, we are not trying this question on the laws of Pennsylvania.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Still, they illustrate the idea of the sanctity of the ballot, so far as the receiving officers are concerned; and that is all I was talking about. I should not have said so much if the Senator from Wisconsin had not defended this act as not only the right, but the duty of the commissioners to open these ballots, peep into them, mark them, and mark the men. I say it interferes with the very idea of the ballot, with the purity of elections, and the independence of elections. I go upon the general principle.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator misunderstands what I have been driving at. I have not been trying the administration of these commissioners at all. I understood him to reply to the Senator from Iowa, who said that there was a mark upon these ballots, that that could not be done. The Senator from Iowa stated the fact with a view of showing that the means were at hand, in reply to the Senator from Indiana, of learning how these soldiers voted, and the Senator from Maine said they could not do it. I did not undertake to argue the propriety of the thing; but I will now say, that when they went no further than to identify the votes given by men whose right to vote they thought was questionable under the law, it was a proper act unless there was a statute which prohibited the doing of it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There I differ with the Senator. That is the very matter I am disputing. I say that was undertaking to do a thing which they had no right to do; that it interferes with the very idea of the freedom and purity of the ballot-box to have ministerial officers undertake to do any such thing. That is where the Senator and I differ.

But I was commenting upon the principle of law which the Senator laid down with so much confidence and elaborated, that a ministerial officer may do anything which is not prohibited.

Mr. HOWE. And I stick to it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Undoubtedly. The Senator never says anything he does not stick to, right or wrong, I believe, if he has once given an opinion. But his sticking to it, more or less, is not any reason why I should believe his doctrine.

But, sir, I was not arguing whether these ballots were to be thrown out or these votes finally to be counted. I did not undertake to argue that matter at all. I was endeavoring to ascertain for myself what this bill was; and I did not even say whether I might not vote for it; but I wanted to understand distinctly what it was. I agree that this case is a very singular one; but I was trying to learn whether the object of the first section of this bill was not to legalize that very thing in an individual case, and a case that has gone by. That is what I was coming to. The fact having transpired, it appears unquestionably that if these officers had not interfered with the ballot-box, not undertaken to open and mark these votes and mark these men, a certain set of men would have been entitled to their seats on the prima facie evidence, whereas they did undertake to interfere with the ballot-box, they did open the ballots, they did mark the ballots, and the consequence is, that they make a return upon which a certificate is issued to a certain other set of men. That is the consequence; and it is that which this first section undertakes to legalize. What I was trying to get at was that the Senate might be in possession of the exact facts, and being in possession of the facts, each Senator can vote, and stick to it, as the Senator from Wisconsin does, according to his own notions.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Maine, and I think all of us must, as to the general principle that the ballot must be held secret and sacred. It is a great right, and is not to be invaded. But I do not think this is a case where it is invaded. The law imposed a duty upon these commissioners who received the votes, which was, to receive the ballots of those who were registered. That was one duty. But after that registry was made another law was passed, which was binding upon every officer, upon everybody, that a certain class of persons, some of whom were registered, should not vote—soldiers who had not resided here a year.

Mr. HENDRICKS. What law does the Senator refer to?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I refer to the law which was read, passed after the registry and before the voting.

Now, then, the commissioners had two duties to perform: one was the ministerial duty of receiving the ballots; and another was the duty to preserve the purity of the election; that it should be according to law; that illegal votes should not be admitted; and what do they do? They do the only thing, I think, that could have been done. They could not refuse to receive the votes. Therefore, they received them. They were not at liberty to permit a fraud to be perpetrated upon the election; and therefore, inasmuch as these were only nominal and not actual voters, they marked those ballots. I do not think that was an invasion of the sanctity of the ballot. The commissioners took the only course that could be taken to obey both laws.

As to this bill being retroactive, let me say that it is no objection to a law that it is retroactive, if the thing, when it was done, was honest and fair and just, and the only defect in it was a technical one, because the law had not provided for such a case. It is perfectly legal and proper and competent for Congress now to say that this return of the commissioners of election, being just, shall be the legal evidence, prima facie, of the election of those mentioned in the return. Therefore, I cannot see that the great principle of the secrecy and sanctity of the ballot is by this proceeding invaded, but that, in fact, the only course was taken which could preserve the fairness of that election.

Mr. CORBETT. I always supposed the secret ballot was for the purpose of protecting the voter from the outside pressure that might be about the polls, intended for intimidation. The commissioners or judges of election are the judges of the legality of the votes usually, and I presume were intended to be so in this case. They were to judge who were the legal voters and who were not. I do not see that there was any impropriety in the commissioners of election checking these ballots in the manner which has been stated, when they were satisfied in their own minds that they were illegal votes, or that there was a doubt about them, and when they came to open the ballots and to count them, to declare that there was such a number of soldiers' votes cast, and report that fact and report that they were illegal.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I have a little to say on this bill. The act of January 8, 1867, authorizes:

"Each and every male person, excepting paupers and persons under guardianship, of the age of twenty-one years and upward, who has not been convicted of any infamous crime or offense, and excepting persons who may have voluntarily given aid and comfort to the rebels in the late rebellion, and who shall have been born or naturalized in the United States, and who shall have resided in the said district for the period of one year and three months in the ward or election precinct in which he shall offer to vote."

Those are the qualifications. The act specifies that a soldier, a sailor, a marine, and an officer shall have been a resident in fact of the District of Columbia for one year; but if he were such a resident, he was as legal a voter as any other. How is the right to vote to be ascertained? Not by the election board; but the act from which I have read a portion of a section makes provision upon that subject:

"That the mayors and aldermen of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, respectively, on or before the 1st day of March, in each year, shall prepare a list of the persons they judge to be qualified to vote in the several wards of said cities in any election; and said mayors and aldermen shall be in open session to receive evidence of the qualification of persons claiming the right to vote in any election therein, and for correcting said list, on two days in each year, not exceeding five days prior to the annual election for the choice of city officers, giving previous notice of the time and place of each session in some newspaper printed in said District."

The next section provides:

"That on or before the 1st day of March the mayors and aldermen of said cities shall post up a list of voters thus prepared in one or more public places in said cities, respectively, at least ten days prior to said annual election."

The list must be prepared by this board. Having been prepared it shall be exhibited to the people in some public places so that the people may judge of the correctness of the list; and after it has thus been exposed, this board, immediately within five days before the election, shall be in open session for the purpose of correcting the list; so that if any person has been omitted from the list he may come before the board; and so that if any person be improperly upon the list, any other voter may make complaint to the board and have the list corrected. This investigation is somewhat judicial in its character; and when made, and when this list is thus completed, it is conclusive upon all election officers. Whether it be conclusive upon a court to which the question might go, I need not now discuss; but upon all executive officers it is unquestionably conclusive, and the law so provides expressly, plainly, and distinctly. When these people come to vote, it is thus regulated by the next section:

"That the officers presiding at any election shall keep and use the check list herein required at the polls during the election of all officers, and no vote shall be received unless delivered by the voter in person, and not until the presiding officer has had opportunity to be satisfied of his identity, and shall find his name on the list, and mark it, and ascertain that his vote is single."

Now, what may these executive officers do? Not revise the list, not adjudicate the question whether any man found upon the list is a legal voter, but they may ascertain his identity. A vote being presented, the board refer to the list. If the man's name is found there, the board may ascertain whether this is the identical person mentioned in that list. Ascertaining that fact, the board must receive his vote, because this is an executive body, not a judicial body, not a revising body.

Now, Mr. President, this whole proceeding was had immediately before the election. The lists were made out. They were exhibited in public places in this city. Any person whose name was not found upon the list had an opportunity within five days before the election, when the board was in open session, of going before the board, and if his right to vote was questioned of producing his evidence; the board would hear his evidence; and upon that evidence adjudicate the question whether he was a legal voter. If any voter observed upon these exhibited lists the name of any person who was not a resident of the District and not within the description of a voter contained in the law, that person, for the purpose of correcting, purifying, and purging the lists, could also go before the board, and it would be the duty of the board then to hear the evidence for and against the right of the voter. That evidence being thus heard in open court, if I may so express it, the adjudication is had; the name is put upon the list, or the name is stricken from the list, according to the judgment. That list then, being thus corrected, being thus conclusive, is handed to executive officers that they may decide who shall vote, not to decide whether a party is a legal voter, for that has been adjudicated according to law, but to decide, in the language of the law, the identity of the party who presents a ballot.

I understand the facts to be, that upon this list were found perhaps one hundred or more soldiers. That list was exhibited; known to the people; the adjudication had; and what did that adjudication settle? It settled that those soldiers were citizens of the District of Columbia, having bona fide residences in the District, and entitled to vote; and when that judgment was made by the board of registration I deny that the election board had any right to inquire whether these men were legal voters.

But, sir, what did this board do? They received the votes. They marked the ballots. I will not rediscuss the question of the propriety or impropriety, the decency or indecency of marking the citizen's vote or the soldier's vote. I deny the right, and I simply now enter my protest against the right of any officer to mark and mar any man's ballot when the law authorizes him to vote by ballot. But the votes were received. The identity having been established to the satisfaction of the board of election the votes were received, counted, the result declared under the law, and that certified by the board of election and handed to the proper officers in the District of Columbia.

When that was completed the board was functus officio. It had no more work to do. As executive officers they had received the ballots, they had counted the ballots, they had declared the result, they had certified that result to the board of aldermen and board of common council in the city, and to the register; and, after that certificate had been thus given, that board had no more power over the result than any other citizen of the District of Columbia. Why, sir, if they could do it the next day they could do it the next month. As soon as the paper is signed, and by them delivered to the proper officer in the District of Columbia, their work is done. Are Senators prepared to say that after an election board have counted the votes, have declared the result, have certified that result to the three proper departments of the government of the District of Columbia, they may nullify it?

I ask Senators if under the law, as read by the Senator from Iowa, the return of the officers of the election board is not the title of a man to the office? After his title has been established by that return that board, having gone out of office in respect to that particular election, being functus officio, has no more power to disturb that return than a man has to mutilate and destroy his deed after it has been delivered. That return is the evidence of right to the man elected to his office. You might as well mar and mutilate the deed that secures to a man his land as to destroy the evidence upon which rests his title to public office. It is impossible that the thing shall be done as is proposed in this bill. According to law these returns were made. According to law these returns were the evidence of the right to the office; and after that right is vested, fixed, and established according to law, Congress cannot take that office from the man. Congress may abolish the office, but being elected to it, according to all the decisions, he has a right in his office, a right that Congress cannot take from him, except that that office itself, for public considerations, may be abolished.

Then I ask, Senators, when this law which the Senator from Iowa read, passed in January, 1867, defines the qualification of the voters; when the law says that there shall be a board to decide in advance who is a legal voter; when the law says that the list made up by them shall be made public so that the people may examine it, and have it corrected; when the law provides that that board of registration shall hold an open session immediately before the election, and that board holds that session, and the right of the people to vote is fixed by the board, where may that be reviewed? Not by an executive officer. I do not question that for fraud or for palpably wrong decision it may be corrected in the courts. That question is not now before us; but that it can be corrected by an executive board authorized simply to receive the ballots, identify the voters, count the ballots, and declare the result—that that board, executive in its character, can review and revise that list is impossible.

Sir, upon what principle are a hundred votes excluded by this board of election, after the voters have passed the scrutiny that the law has provided, after they have gone before the board of registration and been found, upon inquiry, to be residents of the District of Columbia as required by law? Upon what evidence has that been reversed? I ask Senators, after that board of election received the ballots, after they identified the parties, after they counted those ballots, after they certified the result to the proper officers and departments of the city government, upon what evidence did they reverse the decision of the board of registration? These men stood, according to the finding under the law, as legal voters.

It is said that they were not residents of the District of Columbia? Upon what evidence was that decided? The election board received no evidence. These soldiers' votes were marked, contrary to decency in my judgment. After they had cast their votes, after it had been decided that they should vote, they went from the polls; and in their absence, when they had no hearing, when their evidence could not be received, then it was that their ballots were taken from the box, torn up, if you please; then it was that those votes were stricken out, not upon evidence, not upon inquiry, but by the wholesale. Every man that was known to be a soldier was excluded from his ballot, because he was a soldier, upon a general presumption that he had not lived in the District of Columbia a year; not as you would inquire as to the right of A, B, and C to vote in the District, but upon the general proposition that the entire company or companies were to be excluded. It is proposed now in this bill to legalize that transaction; in other words, to put men in office who are not elected (for I deny that that election can be called in question as was proposed in this business) for party purposes. It is not to be tolerated in this country that the votes of men, after they have been received, after they have passed all the tests that the law provides, shall be taken from the box and not counted by an executive board. It cannot be endured. The interests of neither party will endure that. It is the right of every man that these votes shall be counted after their legality has been ascertained in the mode prescribed by the law.

Mr. President, the law as it stood at the time of the election and at the time the certificates were given, was that the certificate of the board of election should be the evidence of the election of an alderman; it should be the evidence of the election of a member of the council. That was the evidence provided. This bill proposes that the register's notification shall be the evidence. Why shall that be interposed now? Has not this certificate gone to the register, and has he any evidence beyond the certificate? Has he any evidence beyond the certificate that has gone to the aldermen and to the council? None. He was not at the election. He is not made by law an appellate tribunal to decide whether these soldiers were legal voters. It is now proposed that a new officer, never authorized to review the proceedings of an election, having no judicial authority, but a register to simply place on file these papers, may review this; that he may set aside the election; that he may give a certificate that the law did not allow him to give at the time the election took place; that he may reverse the evidence upon which men are entitled to their offices. As well may the Legislatures of your States after you, Senators, have been elected and the Secretary of State, under the seal of the State, has evidenced to this body your right to hold your seats, provide that some partisan may issue a certificate that shall be of higher authority, upon which you shall be turned from your positions in this body. Sir, it is not right. This bill is not right.

As to the question who is elected, let it be ascertained judicially. If the law as it now stands does not give to any of the courts the power to make the inquiry, I will vote very cheerfully to give the courts the necessary authority. If there has been fraud in this election, let us know it. If it ought not to stand let the court say so, but not a partisan, not a register. Who is the register, and why shall he decide and revise and review? How is he known to us? Upon what principle do we undertake to say that the evidence which made the title to the office good at the time shall be set aside by the decision of the register in this city?

Mr. President, I propose that this bill shall be recommitted to the committee, with instructions to report amendments providing that the person having the evidence of his election to any office as provided by the law in force at the time of the election, shall be entitled to enter upon the discharge of the duties of the office, and to hold the same until his prima facie right thereto may be set aside by judicial proceedings. My proposition is simply this: that as the evidence required by the law established a prima facie right at the time of the election, so it shall stand until judicial proceedings shall set that prima facie right aside and Congress shall not undertake to legislate one man into office and another out. This election has not been satisfactory. That is very well known; but I do not choose here to discuss it. Some facts are within my knowledge that are very offensive, in my judgment, to men who desire honest elections; but I do not understand that to be a proper inquiry in this body on this bill. I simply take the law as it stands, and I ask that the prima facie right shall be respected until by judicial proceedings it shall be set aside. This bill is offensive in this: that in regard to the mayor the prima facie right is to be respected; in regard to the aldermen, it is to be otherwise. Is that right? Are Senators willing thus to cut the Gordian knot, in the language of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator surely does not intend to misrepresent the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. No, sir.

Mr. HARLAN. There is nothing of that kind in the bill, if I am capable of comprehending its meaning. The bill does propose that the men who hold these certificates of their election shall enter on the discharge of their duties as aldermen and common councilmen until their right to so hold their offices shall be set aside by the supreme court, providing the very thing the Senator himself has proposed in his proposed instructions to the committee. The bill as it now stands provides that the mayor who is prima facie elected, who has been sworn in according to the previous law, shall remain mayor until his right shall be decided in court, and that the aldermen and councilmen who have the certificates of election shall be permitted to hold those offices until their right shall be set aside.

Mr. HENDRICKS. May I ask the Senator what certificate these men hold?

Mr. HARLAN. A certificate from the register of the city, the officer directed by the law to notify the officers of their elections, as I read some time since from the charter. If the Senator will hand the book I will read it again.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I know all about that. The Senator need not trouble himself to read that for the purpose of informing me.

Mr. HARLAN. He is the only officer that is authorized to certify to an election. The commissioners make a duplicate return, one to the mayor of the city, and one to the register of the city. The law does not direct the mayor to notify the parties elected or to give them any certificate whatever, but directs him to publish in the newspapers the return of the commissioners—nothing more—to make a publication for the knowledge of the public; but the law does direct the register to notify the parties elected of their election; so that the register is the only officer in the city who has the right to issue a certificate of election. He has done so to these aldermen and common councilmen, and this bill provides that they shall hold, as having the evidence, prima facie, of their right to these offices until that right shall be set aside by the judiciary—the very thing the Senator himself wants.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The law which the Senator has in his hand provides that the board of election shall certify the result of that election, and the register is simply the keeper of that certificate, and when that certificate is filed with him he simply gives notice to the party of what that certificate contains. He is not a judge, he is simply a clerk to inform the party of what has been certified to his office, that the party may enter upon the discharge of the duties of the office, not by virtue of his notice, but by virtue of the certificate which is conclusive evidence upon the question.

Let me call the attention of the Senator to a feature in that law which shows that my construction is clearly right. That law provides that if the vote be the same for the two candidates, then the board shall decide the result by lot. The board must adjudicate how the vote stands, what the vote is, and if the vote is a tie the board is to award the decision by lot, take that mode of ascertaining who is to hold the office. There is no force given to this notice. It is no evidence of title to the office. The evidence of the party's right to his office is in the board of aldermen and the board of councilmen of the city. The election board must return to each of those boards a certificate of the election, and when the alderman goes to take his seat as a member of the board he does not take it by virtue of the letter of notice from the register. He presents himself and demands to hold his seat by virtue of the certificate that is on file with the board of aldermen.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask him if the alderman does not present his notice to the board of which he is a member as evidence of his right to a seat?

Mr. HENDRICKS. By no means. He may read it or not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What does he carry with him to the board to indicate that he is elected? Does he carry the returns of the election with him?

Mr. HENDRICKS. No, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What does he carry?

Mr. HENDRICKS. The law provides that those returns shall be on file with the board.

Mr. HARLAN. Not at all.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir; and if the Senator will send me the book I will show it.

Mr. HARLAN. It provides that the returns of the election of mayor shall be made to the boards of common council and aldermen; but that the returns of the aldermen shall be made to the register.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator will send me the book I will find it. Here it is:

"Each board shall judge of the legality of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members."

Now, I ask Senators if the board is to judge upon the letter or notice that the register may send to a member of that board, if that is the conclusive point upon which they are to be adjudicate?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I say, if the Senator addresses himself to me—

Mr. HENDRICKS. No; I did not specially address the Senator, but I shall be very happy to hear him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will answer, if the Senator has no objection, that prima facie the person having that notice is entitled to his seat just as much as the Senator is entitled to his seat in this Senate when he presents the certificate of his election; but if any person afterward appears to contest his right to a seat, then the board may proceed to examine the evidence upon which that notice was given. If, however, there is no controversy as to the right of the party having the notice of his election to his seat, he takes his seat by virtue of having that notice in his possession, and that is sufficient evidence for that purpose.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, the return is also to be made to the mayor, who is also to make a publication of it. Now, I ask Senators if that proclamation is the evidence of election? Would any Senator think of presenting that in a court of justice as evidence of the election? Suppose the question should arise as to who was elected in a certain ward, alderman or member of the council, would any Senator in maintaining an action before the court undertake to introduce either the notice of the register or the publication of the mayor? Clearly not. It is a mere statement from the original. The certificate of the election by the election board, the men who count the votes and declare the result and certify the result, gives the evidence, and whenever it is contested it must stand upon that.

Now, Mr. President, as I understand the facts, the board of election in the fifth ward, having counted the votes, certified the result of the election. That certificate was placed on file in the proper offices. Afterward, the board undertook to review their own certificate, and to ascertain some additional facts which they had no jurisdiction of, which they had no right to consider.

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator will allow me to say that I do not understand that to be the precise state of the facts in their historical order. As I have been informed, they made out one of the copies and sent it to the mayor, and afterward, in making out the duplicate, in examining the ballots carefully, they made the discovery I before recited, that if these votes were illegal that they supposed were illegal, the effect would be to change the result of the election, and in making out the first and only return to the register of the city, the legal custodian of these documents, they appended to it affidavits setting forth the facts.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will ask the Senator from Iowa, before he takes his seat, what evidence the election board received in regard to the residence of these soldiers?

Mr. HARLAN. I am unable to answer that. I have not looked into it, and I do not know.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understand the facts to be that they declared that all the soldiers were not legal voters; that they were all non-residents of the District of Columbia, and excluded the whole of them upon the list of names which they marked and the ballots which they marked.

Mr. HARLAN. I will ask the Senator what is the evidence of that fact?

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is the statement which I have not seen controverted. It is about the same character of evidence that we have been acting upon in regard to this whole business. There is no very satisfactory evidence to support this bill one way or the other. My proposition is a fair one, that the prima facie right shall prevail until the cases are heard in the courts. If gentlemen desire to do justice according to the custom in such cases, and what seems to me at least fair and right, there can be no objection to this proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana, to recommit the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia with instructions.

The motion was not agreed to, there being on a division—ayes 9, noes 24.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. DAVIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to hear the amendment read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment; which was to insert as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the mayor of the city of Washington shall not receive the pay or emoluments of any other office.

Mr. WILLEY. Ordinarily I think this is a correct principle when there is a proper case to which it can be applied; but Mr. Bowen is now holding the position of postmaster of this city, not by virtue of a commission. The term of his office has expired. He is doing it for the accommodation of the public. It is not an office of the same character as that to which he has been elected. It is not like the instance mentioned by the Senator from Kentucky of the Secretary of the Interior acting also now as Attorney General. If he shall hold the office any longer of postmaster it will be for the accommodation of the public, and not because he is holding on to the office at his own instance, but simply because the President does not appoint some person in his place. Under these circumstances, if he discharges for the public the duties of that office, and also discharges the duties of the office of Mayor, I cannot see the propriety of depriving him of the compensation of both offices under the circumstances. If the circumstances were different, of course I should have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. I suppose if Mr. Bowen was nominated to the office of postmaster, that the honorable Senator from West Virginia would vote for the confirmation of the nomination; and I presume that every Senator present would give the same vote. Then he would continue to receive the pay of mayor, and also the pay of postmaster. The honorable Senator from West Virginia assumes the principle that the President cannot displace Mr. Bowen.

Mr. WILLEY. No, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. Do I understand the honorable Senator to say that the President can remove Mr. Bowen?

Mr. WILLEY. The Senator will understand me to say that Mr. Bowen's term of service has expired. He is not in office now.

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask the honorable Senator whether he is in office or out of office now?

Mr. WILLEY. He is out of office.

Mr. DAVIS. According to the honorable Senator's position, there is no postmaster in the city of Washington. He does not say de jure or de facto. He says that the late postmaster is out of office.

Mr. WILLEY. He is discharging the duties of two offices at the same time.

Mr. DAVIS. Now, Mr. President, where is the difference in principle? It is now a general law of the United States, and has been for many years, that no man who is in office, receiving the pay and emoluments of one office, shall receive the pay and emoluments of another office at the same time. The honorable Senator has recognized that principle repeatedly in the Committee on Claims, and has voted for its application in denying several classes of officers who charged pay or emoluments for a second office from making such charge against the Government. In that he did right. In that he acted in conformity to a general law of Congress that has been in force and effect for many years, that no individual who holds one office and is receiving the pay of that office shall receive the pay of another office at the same time. Now, sir, suppose the President of the United States should make another nomination for this office, and the nominee was thrown before the Senate, if he were a Democrat the honorable Senator from West Virginia would vote against him.

Mr. WILLEY. How does the Senator know that?

Mr. DAVIS. Judging from what you always do.

Mr. WILLEY. The Senator knows very well that that is not always the case. If he would extend his recollection no further back than the last twenty-four hours, it would satisfy him that that statement is not justified by the facts.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator now refers to his vote upon the confirmation of the minister to England.

Mr. WILLEY. I will say further, if the Senator will allow me, that when Mr. Johnson turned out every Republican appointed in West Virginia my colleague and myself agreed to the confirmation in their places of about half Democrats.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand the Senator, then, to assume this position: that when the President of the United States makes a nomination of a Democrat competent to perform the duties of postmaster of this city he will vote for his nomination without regard to his politics.

Mr. WILLEY. The Senator will understand me, that whenever a nomination is made, if it suits me, I will vote for it; if it does not, I will not.

Mr. DAVIS. Exactly; and the nominee will be sure not to suit the Senator unless he is a Radical. I do not quarrel with him about that, and do not object to the honorable Senator voting for or against the confirmation of any nomination of the President upon any consideration which he deems proper. But I am assuming now what is the fact: that Mr. Bowen is still postmaster of this city, and that he will continue to be the postmaster until the majority of the Senate shall say that he shall not be the postmaster. The general principle is simply this, and it is the only principle involved in the case, that a man shall not be allowed to receive the pay of two offices at the same time. That is the principle, and every man can comprehend it. It is either right or wrong. If it is right in other cases, it is right also in the case of Mr. Bowen. If others have to be excluded, he should be excluded. If the tenure-of-office bill be legal and valid in its operation, which I say it is not, but which the honorable Senator from West Virginia says is the fact, that man Bowen is not out of the office of postmaster of this city; he is in it; he is in the performance of its duties; he is in the receipt of its pay and emoluments, and is so entitled to continue until a majority of the Senate shall say that he shall go by confirming another nomination made for the same office by the President of the United States.

There is no difference in principle between the case of Mr. Bowen, such as the honorable Senator from West Virginia sought to draw, and the case of any other officer who is in office receiving the pay and emoluments of one office, and a bill should provide that he should receive the pay and emoluments of another office. I will put this question to the honorable Senator from West Virginia: if there was a collector of customs or of internal revenue or any other officer receiving pay and emoluments, and a proposition was made to give to that officer the pay and emoluments of another office, assigning to him the performance of the duties of another office, would he vote against a proposition withholding from that officer the pay and emoluments of the second office, or would he vote that he should have both? I have no doubt the honorable Senator would vote that he should not have the pay and emoluments of the second office. I know no difference of principle or fact between that case and the case of Mr. Bowen. Mr. Bowen is mayor of this city, prima facie, and probably according to law. At any rate, he is installed into the office; he is receiving the emoluments of that office. He is also postmaster of the city of Washington; and I propose that while he is mayor he shall not receive the pay and emoluments of the office of postmaster or any other office. The proposition is understood by the Senate. If the Senate intends to be inconsistent, and to give a Republican Radical favorite the pay of two lucrative offices, as well as their honors, be it so. I cannot do anything myself except submit.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 7, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Doolittle, Hendricks, McCreery, Patterson of Tennessee, and Vickers—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Conkling, Dixon, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, Johnson, Morton, Norton, Saulsbury, Sprague, and Trumbull—16.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move to amend the first section of the bill by striking out the words "satisfactory evidence," in the fifth line, and inserting the words "regular official returns;" so that the section will read:

That whenever any person has received, or shall hereafter receive, a certificate from the register of the city of Washington, based upon regular official returns furnished by the commissioners of election, notifying him of his election to any elective office of said city, &c.

This amendment raises directly the true point involved in this first section. These commissioners of election were appointed by the judges of the supreme court of the District. Their duties were, under the law, to receive the votes of persons on the registration lists, to count the votes, and to make a report to the mayor of the city, who was to give notice in the newspapers of the result. They were then to make a copy or a duplicate of their return and transmit it to the register. That was done; and it was after their duties under the law were completed, and upon the day following the election, that a part of these commissioners proceeded to make out another paper or another return. In my judgment, they had no more right to make it than a member of the Senate had; because their duties under the law were performed. What it is proposed to validate by this first section is not a return of the election made by the election commissioners; but it is attempted to supersede that regular and official and legal return by a supplemental paper, which was made out by a part of the commissioners. That fact seems to have been overlooked in the debate.

Now, sir, what I propose is, in drafting a law which shall apply not only to the present election, but to all future elections, the register shall make out his certificate from the official returns made to him by the commissioners of election; whereas, under the bill as it now stands, he is to make that return upon any "satisfactory evidence." The very form of this first section exposes its impropriety. It is not proposed that the register shall make certificates upon the official returns filed with him under the law by the election commissioners, but that he may make out his returns upon any "satisfactory evidence" which may be furnished to him by those commissioners, or by any part of them.

Sir, this election was held; and after the votes were counted, on the evening of the day of the election, it was announced that Mr. Given was elected mayor of the city, and that there was a Conservative majority in the common council, and, I believe, a tie in the board of aldermen. After midnight, singularly enough, it was discovered that there was an error in one of the wards, and the commissioners proceeded to correct that error, as it is alleged, by which a majority for Mr. Given was changed into a majority for Mr. Bowen. That was done after the first count, as I understand; and that result was reached, it is alleged, by correcting some error in the night. Whether that was fair or not is not for me to say; but for our present purpose we may assume that it was a fair proceeding and that it was an honest correction of an error.

But sir, what do we have? The commissioners, and the whole of them acting together, made out a return of the election not only for the board of aldermen, but for the board of common council, and transmitted that return to the mayor of the city, under the law. Upon that return there was a Conservative majority in the common council. The mayor, under the law, having received that return, issued a notice through the newspapers of the city, which was in the nature of a proclamation, announcing the result, not only to the candidates, but to the public; and when the board of aldermen and common councilmen were to convene, he transmitted to them, as I understand, these official returns which had been duly made to him by the commissioners of election. Then a part of the commissioners, as I said before, afterward made out a paper or a statement and sent it to the register. It was not a return of the election; it was a statement by them with regard to the quality of certain of the votes alleged to have been soldier's votes, and upon that information, irregular and unlawful, the register made out returns which were laid, or were attempted to be laid, before the legislative body when they convened.

What is the object? There is no doubt about the question of law. The regular return of the election was sent to the mayor of the city and was proclaimed, and that official return was sent to the boards of aldermen and of councilmen when they met, and there was an organization upon those clearly official, regular, lawful papers. But there was a secession, a bolt, by a portion of the members of the common council, who, upon notices merely which the register had sent to particular persons in one of the wards, attempted to admit and to use those men as members of the board, and they set up a separate organization, or attempted to set up one, that cannot endure legal investigation or the action of the common council itself and of the board of aldermen, because the control of the board of aldermen has passed from the bolting party and is in the line of regular and lawful action at this moment, and this seceding body in the common council, if Congress does not interpose, will be obliged to do just what was done by a similar interest in the Legislature of Pennsylvania on a signal occasion at the time of the Buck-shot war; the seceding members, who set up, under the lead of Mr. STEVENS, a House of their own, were forced to give up their organization and come into the regular body; the dispute came to an end. Just so here; if Congress does not interpose, if by a vote taken here it is shown that Congress will not interpose in behalf of either party to this dispute, this affair will settle itself in twenty-four hours. It was got up, no doubt, with the intention of appealing to Congress and getting some new law by which a partisan advantage should be gained and a decision be made in favor of those who are departing from the laws which regulate the election.

One word more and I will leave the subject. Mr. President, as already argued by the Senator from Indiana, under the law the result of the election was to be certified by the commissioners who held it. They did, after counting the votes, go on and certify the result of the election, and the whole of the commissioners acted in that proceeding, and when they had completed it their functions ended. They had no power to do anything more except, possibly, to transmit the papers afterward. They might do that through a messenger. Then, I repeat, a part of the board undertook afterward to hold a judicial investigation of the election, and get up a paper setting aside some part of the vote which had been polled. And here we are by act of Congress to sanction this proceeding, virtually to turn out the men who were regularly reported elected in one of the wards, and to put their opponents in and to organize the board, so that when it comes to the investigation of the qualifications of those rejected voters, there can be a decision obtained in favor of somebody or of some interest.

Observe there is not the slightest evidence before the Senate, although we are asked to pass this bill, that there was an illegal vote at the election. On the other hand, the presumption is that these were legal votes, although open to question and to investigation, of course, if anybody chooses to raise an inquiry. The presumption is, that the registry was right, that the persons who made the registration, Mr. Bowen himself being one of them, made an honest and proper enumeration of the persons in this city qualified to exercise the elective franchise, and for five days before the election there was the opportunity to revise those lists and to make them perfect and complete and exactly in accordance with this very law which is now appealed to on the subject of soldiers.

I say, then, that every presumption is in favor of the legality of the votes which were received in that ward and which were undeniably upon the registration list. And observe, sir, that under the prior law, before this act of this spring to which allusion is made, one year's residence in this city was required, not of citizens merely but of soldiers also—of all classes. Consequently these registrars, of whom Mr. Bowen was one, must only have registered those persons in the military service who had been residents of the city of Washington for one year before. They did register them, and their names were put up for public inspection, and they remained there after the registration lists were revised. There is, therefore, no reason for the declaration, which is made here with such confidence, that those votes were illegal.

And, sir there is no pretense that the election officers did investigate the question of their right to vote at all. They had no right under the law to do it when the election was held. There is no pretense that they attempted to do it, certainly after the election was over. They entered into no examination; they called no witnesses with reference to these voters. They did not examine the voters themselves.

How could they say that any one of them was not entitled to vote? Certainly they could not. Therefore all that this board did was not only a usurpation of power, but it was an outrage upon the electors of the city of Washington that they, without the slightest authority, without any color of law to sanction their proceedings, should strike from the poll the necessary number to count off particular officers from the returns and count in others, and to do this after these very men themselves had certified under the law the result of the election and their duties had come to an end.

It is not for me, sir, to describe the conduct of these commissioners of election; but there is one thing I can do; I can form an opinion of the attitude and position in which I should be placed by voting for this bill which has been sent here in their interest. I should consider myself disgraced by sanctioning any law to patch up a miserable election trick of this kind to enable certain persons in the common council of the city to possess the legal power if they please hereafter to purge the election, or to transfer this dispute to a court of the District to undergo investigation there perhaps for six months or a year, and meantime install the rejected persons in office in the board of common council and enable them to control the patronage of the city of Washington and place their favorites in office, or, at all events, to hold the other branch of the local legislature, the board of aldermen, in check, and control them in taking such action as they are entitled to take under the law of their organization.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BUCKALEW called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. BUCKALEW. This amendment simply provides that the register of the city shall make out his certificate upon the official returns made to him by the election officers instead of "satisfactory evidence."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to make one suggestion to the Senator. I am sure he sees the effect of this amendment, but it defeats the bill. I presume every Senator sees that, because, of course, one board of aldermen will claim that certain returns are not regular, and the other board will claim that they are regular, and it leaves the question just as we find it, and unless we pass the bill as it stands we accomplish nothing.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 8, nays 29; as follows;

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Doolittle, Fowler, Hendricks, McCreery, Patterson of Tennessee, and Vickers—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Ferry, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Cattell, Conkling, Dixon, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Johnson, Morton, Norton, Saulsbury, Sprague, and Trumbull—17.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDRICKS. In the fourth section, after the word "trial," in the twelfth line, I move to insert the words "and either party may have a trial by jury."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to strike out the following words in the third section, fifth and sixth lines, "and the action of said court in relation thereto shall be final." I will state to the Senate that I think the amendment should be adopted. The proceeding contemplated in this section is summary and ought not to be final. It provides for placing the party in office upon the certificate alone, and does not propose to go into the merits of the controversy, if controversy shall exist, and upon that trial, when the case is to be decided exclusively by the certificate given by the register, the finding or decision of the court ought not to be final. I will read the section:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or any judge thereof, shall have jurisdiction to enforce, by mandamus or otherwise, the right of any person holding the certificate mentioned in the first section of this act; and the action of said court in relation thereto shall be final.

I move to strike from this last clause all after the word "act."

Mr. HARLAN. I see no objection to the Senator's amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Very well.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. One more amendment and I shall not trouble the Senate. I move to strike out the second section.

The section was read as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall hinder or obstruct a person holding the certificate of election mentioned in the foregoing section from entering upon or discharging the duties of such office, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof in any court of competent jurisdiction shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000, or be imprisoned in the county jail not exceeding six months, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. HENDRICKS. This is an extraordinary provision, I think, to make it a crime to obstruct in any way the entering upon an office by anybody. I do not know of any such provision in any of the States, and I think we are getting quite enough of criminal laws on the statutes of the United States without a provision of this sort. I think there are two vices now prevalent, one making a crime out of everything until "crime" ceases to be offensive almost, and the other is requiring everything to be sworn to, so that the sanctity of an oath is absolutely lost.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. VICKERS. I offer an amendment to add to the fourth section the following proviso:

Provided, That this act shall not extend to the contested elections now pending in the said city, but that the said elections shall be decided by the tribunal which shall have jurisdiction of the same.

The amendment was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1255) for the relief of Champe Carter, jr.; and a joint resolution (H. R. No. 295) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to remit the duties on certain articles contributed to the National Association of American Sharpshooters; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 322) granting a pension to Sherman H. Cowles;

A bill (S. No. 323) granting a pension to Michael Kelley;

A bill (S. No. 344) granting a pension to Caroline and Margaret Swartwout;

A bill (S. No. 420) granting a pension to James A. Guthrie;

A bill (S. No. 421) granting a pension to Caroline E. Thomas;

A bill (S. No. 424) granting a pension to Bartlett and Carrie Edwards, children of David W. Edwards, deceased; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 137) requesting the President to intercede with her Majesty, the Queen of Great Britain, to secure the speedy release of Rev. John McMahon, convicted of treason-felony, and now confined at Kingston, Canada West.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CATTELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 543) to provide for a further issue of temporary loan certificates for the purpose of redeeming and retiring the remainder of the outstanding compound interest notes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 544) to provide for a board of commissioners for the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 605) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1869; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 294) donating to the Washington City Orphan Asylum the iron railing taken from the old Hall of the House of Representatives was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The bill (H. R. No. 1215) for the relief of Champe Carter, jr., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 295) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to remit the duties on certain articles contributed to the National Association of American Sharpshooters was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. POMEROY, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 13, 1868.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

On motion of Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to a question of privilege. On the 25th of May I offered a resolution, which was adopted, calling upon the Comptroller of the Currency for certain information. On the next day the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOOPER,] whom I do not now see in his seat, entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted. Since that time he has taken no action in connection with that motion, and I now call it up and move that it be laid upon the table.

Mr. CULLOM. Is that privileged?

The SPEAKER. It is, and can be called up at any time when there is no business before the House.

Mr. CULLOM. There is evidently no quorum here.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will wait until the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] is in his seat.

Mr. RANDALL. I have waited two weeks already and the gentleman from Massachusetts has taken no action on the subject, and this is the only time in the day when I can make my motion. I ask that the resolution may be read for the information of the House.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Comptroller of the Currency be requested to furnish to this House a statement of the amount of dividends declared by the national banking associations since their organization under the present national banking act; the amount credited to the real estate account distinct from the capital expended therefor; the amount credited to the surplus account; the amount of their undivided profits and all losses, each respectively per annum. If such information be not in his possession, he is further directed to take prompt measures to procure and transmit the same to this House.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. This is evidently going to require a division of the House, and it is apparent there is no quorum here. Besides, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] is not present. As this is a privileged matter the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] can call it up at any time.

Mr. RANDALL. I am advised by the Speaker that this is the only time in the day when I can call the matter up.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, here entered the Hall and said: I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. RANDALL. I renew the motion to reconsider, and also move to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. That is not necessary; and besides the time for making the motion to reconsider has passed.

SARAH HACKLEMAN.

Mr. HOLMAN. There was a tacit understanding on yesterday that I should have permission to introduce the bill which I now send to the Clerk's desk to be read. I hope there will be no objection to it.

The bill was one granting a pension to Sarah Hackleman, widow of Brigadier General Pleasant A. Hackleman.

The bill was read at length. The first section directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension roll the name of Sarah Hackleman, widow of Brigadier General Pleasant A. Hackleman, for a pension at the rate of fifty dollars a month, from the 3d day of October, 1862, on which day General Hackleman fell mortally wounded at the battle of Corinth.

The second section discontinues the pension heretofore allowed to Sarah Hackleman under the general law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the introduction of this bill for consideration at the present time?

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire the attention of the House for a moment while I explain this bill. I hold in my hand—

Mr. HARDING. Has that bill been reported from any committee?

The SPEAKER. It has not. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] asks unanimous consent for its introduction and consideration at this time.

Mr. HARDING. I think the bill should be referred to a committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that. It was understood yesterday that I should have leave to introduce this bill.

Mr. HARDING. It is a very unusual proceeding.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman will listen to me for a moment—

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARDING] persists in his objection, the bill is not now before the House.

Mr. HARDING. I insist upon my objection. I am willing that the bill shall be introduced and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is too late in the session to expect to get any more reports from that committee, as the gentleman from Illinois well understands.

Mr. HARDING. I hope not, for there are several bills before that committee in which my constituents are interested.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will consent to have the bill referred, if permission can be given to the committee to report upon it at any time.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope that permission will be given, and also to report at any time in the case of Mrs. Beeler, the widow of Major Beeler, a paymaster, who died while in the service of the Government.

Mr. HARDING. I object to any special privileges being given to the widows of officers who are now receiving pensions and desire an increase of pension, while there are dozens of widows of private soldiers who need pensions and have not received them.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well; then I will try and get this bill before the House on Monday next.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. SCHENCK. I call for the regular order.
The SPEAKER. A question of privilege is the regular order.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to call up for action the amendments of the Senate to the House joint resolution to relieve from political disabilities R. R. Butler, of Tennessee.

Mr. MYERS. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] yield to me for a moment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] has called for the regular order.

Mr. MYERS. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that call for a moment.

Mr. DAWES. In view of the condition of the House this morning I will not call it up at this time if the gentleman from Ohio will permit me to call it up immediately after the morning hour this morning.

Mr. SCHENCK. It will occasion debate or a division of the House, and take up time.

Mr. DAWES. Then, if the gentleman insists upon it, I shall have to call it up now.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman can do as he pleases, but I do not think he should do what he says.

Mr. DAWES. There is no objection, so far as I know, to the amendment of the Senate, but it is necessary to have action of the House upon it.

Mr. MYERS. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. MYERS. My point of order is that it is not in order for gentlemen to converse with each other across the Hall.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it may be, for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] was conversing with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] across the aisle a few minutes since.

Mr. MYERS. I, however, addressed the Chair.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] will not object to my calling this matter up on Monday next, I will not call it up till then.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well, let it come up on Monday.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the gentleman will make no objection.

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot help myself, for it is a question of privilege.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now commenced, and the first business in order is the reporting of bills of a private nature, commencing with the Committee on Roads and Canals.

No reports from the Committee on Roads and Canals were presented.

CHAMPE CARTER, JR.

Mr. ELIOT, from the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1255) for the relief of Champe Carter, jr.; which was read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes and directs the Commissioner of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands to pay to Champe Carter, jr., late sub-assistant commissioner of the bureau for the counties of Robertson and Milan, in the State of Texas, out of moneys heretofore appropriated for the use of the bureau, the sum of $526 50, being the amount due to him for services as sub-assistant commissioner from March 17, 1866, to August 29, 1866.

Mr. WARD. I would like to hear an explanation of this bill.

Mr. ELIOT. Mr. Speaker, Champe Carter, jr., the person for whose relief this bill is proposed, was appointed March 17, 1866, as a sub-assistant commissioner in an interior part of the State of Texas. According to the evidence before the committee he rendered very faithful service from March 17, 1866, till August 29 of the same year. In July, 1866, the bill continuing the bureau was passed, and one of the provisions of that bill required all the agents of the bureau to take the test-oath. It turned out that Mr. Carter had been engaged in the service of the confederacy. Upon the passage of that law General Kiddoo, who was in command of that division, wrote a letter to Mr. Carter, saying that he was very sorry to be compelled to dispense with his services, but that the law required he should be relieved because he could not take the oath. Carter had before stated to the general what his services had been, and although he was a registered voter and a very loyal and true man yet he was unable to take the oath, and had to be relieved. The accounts for his pay were sent in, and the Commissioner, upon examination, stated that he would be very glad to allow the vouchers to be paid but for the provision of the act which made it necessary that Congress should authorize the payment. The evidence before the committee is very full, showing not only that Mr. Carter is a very worthy man in private life, but that he earnestly and faithfully performed the duties of his office; and no reason exists against giving him pay. He has had no compensation for any of his work on account of the provision of law to which I have referred. The bill makes no appropriation, but simply authorizes the Commissioner to apply moneys now in his hands to the payment of this man.

Mr. WARD. I desire to inquire what were the services rendered by this man to the confederacy which incapacitated him to take the oath?

Mr. ELIOT. He was for a short time a non-commissioned officer in the service of the confederacy.

Mr. WARD. Does the gentleman think we should be employing that class of persons as agents of the Freedmen's Bureau?

Mr. ELIOT. Well, sir, other things being equal, I should say that we should not. But this is a good man, and I hope there will be no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. BURR. Will the gentleman permit me to make an inquiry?

Mr. ELIOT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURR. I wish, in the first place, to ask whether it is necessary to have an act of Congress to provide for payment in special cases of this kind; and secondly, what evidence is there that this applicant, notwithstanding the fact that he held a position in the rebel army and fought against the Government, has been since that time what the gentleman calls "a good man?"

Mr. ELIOT. We have the evidence coming from General Kiddoo, and also the affidavits of two or three officials in the part of Texas where this man resided, certifying upon oath to his character and the general worthiness of his conduct.

Mr. BURR. The gentleman recognizes the fact, then, I suppose, that a man may have been for the time being engaged in the rebellion and yet be a good man. I wish to ask him whether he does recognize that or not?

Mr. ELIOT.

"While the lamp holds out to burn
The vilest sinner may return."

[Laughter.]

Mr. VAN TRUMP. Was this gentleman a conscript or a volunteer in the confederate service?

Mr. ELIOT. I cannot say from my own knowledge, but I infer from the letter in which General Kiddoo refers to the conversation he had with Mr. Carter that he was so in the service as to be within the purview of the law.

Mr. MULLINS. He ought never to have been there; and, sir, I will never vote for a man who was in the rebel service.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. This man rendered the service for which he asks to be paid.

Mr. PILE. Was he in the rebel army or in the confederate civil service?

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. I desire to know from the gentleman from Massachusetts whether or not it would not be better to make the bill general in its character, and let it apply to all persons similarly situated?

Mr. ELIOT. There is not another case in the bureau. This is a solitary exceptional case.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. What reason other than that he belonged to the Freedmen's Bureau is there for exempting him than any other man who was in the confederate service. I hope this will be referred to some committee, so we may have uniform general legislation, and not this class legislation.

Mr. HARDING. Was he at the time he was appointed qualified under our laws to perform this service?

Mr. ELIOT. He was appointed before the law was passed in July, 1866, and was in office at the time.

Mr. HARDING. Why, then, cannot the Department pay him?

Mr. ELIOT. Because of the provision of that law which disabled him. He was immediately relieved, and he now asks to be paid for the time he was in service before the law passed making it unlawful for him to be appointed.

Mr. MULLINS demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put on the passage of the bill; and there were—yeas 49, nays 19, not voting 120; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Baker, Barnes, Beatty, Beck, Brownell, Chanler, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cornell, Dawes, Dixon, Ela, Eliot, Ferriss, Getz, Glossbrenner, Harding, Higby, Holman, Hopkins, Chester D. Van Horn, and Henry D. Washburn—49.

NAYS—Messrs. Beaman, Burr, Cobb, Cullow, Goldaday, Grover, Hawkins, Judd, Ketcham, Knott, Mullins, Scofield, Shellabarger, Aaron F. Stevens, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Trump, Ward, and Elihu B. Washburne—19.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Baldwin, Banks, Barnum, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Doyer, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Cake, Cary, Reader W. The SPEAKER. There is no quorum voting.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Then I move that there be a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk accordingly proceeded to call the roll, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Adams, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Baldwin, Banks, Barnum, Beaman, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Brooks, Broomall, Butler, Cary, Reader W. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, I presume many of the absentees were not aware of the fact that the session to-day commenced at eleven o'clock.

The SPEAKER. That may be; it was only ordered last night at ten o'clock. A quorum is now present.

Mr. WARD. I move that the further call of the House be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays will be again called on the passage of the bill.

The question was again taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 70, nays 27, not voting 92; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Barnes, Beaman, Beatty, Beck, Blaine, Boyer, Bromwell, Buckland, Cake, Chanler, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cornell, Dawes, Dixon, Eckley, Ella, Eliot, Ferriss, Fields, Getz, Glossbrenner, Harding, Higby, Holman, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Chester D. NAYS—Messrs. Benjamin, Burr, Cobb, Covode, Cullom, Delano, Golladay, Gravely, Griswold, Grover, Hawkins, Hooper, Kelsoy, Knott, Kootz, Logan, Maynard, Morrissey, Mullins, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Trump, Elihu B. Washburne, and Welker—27.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Baldwin, Banks, Barnum, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Brooks, Broomall, Butler, Cary, Reeder W. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward—92.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (H. R. No. 187) requesting the President to intercede with her Majesty, the Queen of Great Britain, to secure the speedy release of Rev. John McMahon, convicted on a charge of treason-felony, and now confined at Kingston, Canada West; when the Speaker signed the same.

Mr. MYERS obtained the floor to make a report from the Committee on Patents under the call of the committees, but yielded to Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas.

GREAT AND LITTLE OSAGE INDIANS.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following preamble and resolution for consideration at the present time:

Whereas it is reported that a treaty has recently been concluded with the Great and Little Osage Indians, by which it is proposed to transfer eight million acres of land, located in the State of Kansas, to a railroad corporation; and whereas it is reported that by the provisions of said treaty the people of the United States are excluded from the rights of homestead and preemption settlement; and whereas it is also reported that improper influences have been used to accomplish the framing and signing of said treaty, and that the interests of the Indians and of the people have been grossly and fraudulently neglected; and whereas an investigation has been ordered by this House, into all the facts connected with said treaty: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President is hereby directed to furnish to this House copies of all instructions, records, and correspondence connected with the commission authorized to make the above-named treaty, and copies of all propositions made to said commission from railroad corporations or by individuals; and the President is requested to withhold said treaty from the Senate until a full investigation can be had and report made by the Committee on Indian Affairs of this House.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will not object to this if the object of introducing it is to inquire into the conduct of our own officials and investigate that with a view to dealing with them. But if the object is to interfere with the treaty-making power of the Government, I shall feel compelled to object.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. The House has already ordered an investigation into all the facts connected with the making of this treaty by a commission appointed by the President of the United States. The purpose is not to interfere in any way with the treaty-making power.

Mr. MAYNARD. Very well, I withdraw the objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman from Kansas that he modify his resolution by striking out the word "directed" and inserting "requested." That is the usual mode of addressing the President.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I will modify the resolution in that way.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I hope something of this kind will be done. I know that there are two or three men in Texas—railroad men, who are monopolizing the public lands there for their railroads, and obstructing all improvements in the State. I hope there will be a thorough investigation of the whole matter.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MYERS. I desire, before yielding further, to inquire how much of the morning hour there is remaining?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour will expire at eighteen minutes past twelve.

Mr. MYERS. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. LYNCH.]

UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. LYNCH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1256) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for holding the courts of the United States in case of the sickness or other disability of the judges of the district court," approved July 29, 1850; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MYERS. I yield now for a moment to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.]

REMOVAL OF THE SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire to take up the time of the House, but I desire to give notice that on Monday next I shall move to suspend the rules to offer a resolution authorizing the appointment of a committee of this House to select a site for the capital of the United States, on account of the disregard of the law and the disloyal element that is constantly showing itself in such bitterness in this city toward the loyal people of this country and in disregard of the authority of the United States.

Mr. MYERS. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. JULIAN.]

LANDS IN SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1257) relative to lands sold for non-payment of Federal taxes or under a judgment or decree of the courts of the United States in the States lately in rebellion; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MYERS. I yield now for a moment to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HAWKINS.]

SETH LEA.

Mr. HAWKINS. I ask unanimous consent of the House to report from the Committee on Military Affairs a bill for the relief of Seth Lea.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let it be read.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Seth Lea, of Knox county, Tennessee, on the roll of invalid pensions at the rate of the full pension now allowed by law to a second lieutenant, said pension to commence on the 5th day of April, 1865, and to continue for his natural life.

Mr. BURR. I would ask how and why this bill comes from the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. HAWKINS. I will explain the bill. This man was employed to recruit for the Federal Army with the promise that he should be commissioned as a lieutenant. After carrying several hundred men across the mountains, and while crossing the mountains with others, he and the men who were with him were captured by the rebels. He was imprisoned in Castle Thunder from 1863 to the close of the war, and was disabled by being frost-bitten while in prison. This bill is reported unanimously by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is a pension bill. It may be a meritorious case, but it seems to me that it ought not to come from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope no objection will be interposed to this bill. The application was for pay while thus imprisoned in Castle Thunder, having been captured in the manner my colleague [Mr. HAWKINS] has described. The Committee on Military Affairs, however, thought the relief proper in the case would be a pension, and they have reported a bill accordingly. The man is now between sixty and seventy years of age, and is almost dead from the effects of his imprisonment. He is also in very necessitous circumstances in consequence of the war, although when the war commenced he was in comfortable circumstances.

Mr. BURR. If the Committee on Military Affairs see fit to report a pension bill—

Mr. MYERS. I rise to a question of order. If the Patent Committee is not reached before the morning hour expires, will the portion of the hour this morning count against the committee?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. MYERS. I must then resume the floor.

Mr. BURR. I only intended to place the Committee on Pensions right in this matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] to object to the consumption of time.

Mr. MYERS. I am willing to yield if the morning hour of to-day is not counted against us, provided the Patent Committee is not called before the expiration of that morning hour.

The SPEAKER. It will count against the committee. Any fraction of the hour will count as an hour.

Mr. MYERS. As we yielded our right to the Committee on Invalid Pensions to the morning hour of yesterday, and as the morning hour of to-day is about to expire, I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of this morning hour be not counted against the Committee on Patents, but that our time shall be regarded as beginning on next private bill day.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. MYERS. Then I must resume the floor now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] having resumed the floor, the bill of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HAWKINS] is not before the House.

WOOD-SCREW PATENTS.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Patents, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, House bill No. 810, for the relief of the widow and heirs of Thomas W. Harvey, deceased.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. MYERS. For the purpose of saving time, I now call the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Has not this bill been already acted upon and disposed of by this House?

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the bill be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill to the House, after which the question will be upon seconding the call for the previous question.

The bill was read at length. It authorizes the Committee on Patents to hear the application of the widow and heirs of Thomas W. Harvey, deceased, for a reextension of the patent heretofore granted to the said Harvey, on the 30th of May, 1846, for an improvement in machinery for cutting screws, and reissued on the 28th of December, 1858; and also the application of the heirs of Thomas W. Harvey for the reextension of the patent heretofore granted to said Harvey, on the 18th of August, 1846, for improvement in machinery for dressing screw-heads, and reissued on the 4th of January, 1859, and to grant the extension of said patents for the period of seven years respectively, from the 30th of May, 1867, and the 18th of August, 1867, when said patents by law expired; provided that the patents shall be extended only for the benefit of the widow and legal heirs of said Harvey, and that these extensions shall not develop for the use and benefit of any corporation or person claiming any right or interest in either of the said patents by virtue of any alleged agreement, transfer, or assignment heretofore executed by the said heirs, or any arbitration or award heretofore made between the said heirs and any other person or corporation; and if at any time said extended letters-patent shall become in whole or in part the property of the company which owned said patents at the time when they were about to expire, or of their successors, then this act shall at once thereafter become void and of no effect; and provided also that all rights in law or equity of the persons legally in possession of machines covered by said patents shall be fully protected in all cases from the said extensions of letters-patent; provided said Commissioner, after full hearing, upon due notice to all persons desiring to contest said extensions, shall be of opinion that said patents should be so extended.

Mr. MYERS. I call the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move to lay this bill on the table. I have helped to kill it three times, and I want to kill it the fourth time.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MYERS.]

Mr. MYERS. I withdraw the call for the previous question, to hear the gentleman's inquiry.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to inquire whether this is the same patent the renewal of which has been refused by the House heretofore?

Mr. MYERS. It is a new bill.

Mr. DAWES. I trust the gentleman will answer my question.

Mr. MYERS. I have not the time now, as the morning hour is about to expire.

Mr. DAWES. I want to know whether this is the same patent (the bill being drawn in a different shape) the extension of which has been twice defeated in this House?

Mr. MYERS. I will answer the gentleman as soon as I have the time. The Committee on Patents has had no time to report, I having yielded to a number of gentlemen; and the morning hour is about to expire. If the House will second the previous question, I will make a full explanation and yield to other gentlemen who may desire to discuss the bill. I demand the call for the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Have I not the right to call for the reading of the report?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not while the demand for the previous question is pending.

Mr. DAWES. Is this proposition, which been twice defeated, to be put through without the report being read?

Mr. MYERS. I will withdraw the call for the previous question, and I trust my colleague [Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania] will withdraw the motion to lay on the table. I have yielded all the time the committee had to-day, and I think we have been treated rather unkindly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What is the pending question?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] to lay the bill on the table, is still pending.

Mr. MYERS. I hope my colleague, considering the circumstances, will withdraw that motion.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. No, sir; I cannot withdraw it. This is the same old wood-screw patent coming before us in its ghostly form for, I believe, the ninth time.

On the motion of Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, that the bill be laid on the table, there were—ayes 47, noes 50.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I call for tellers.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired; and this bill goes over till the morning hour of Friday next.

CHILDREN OF G. W. FREER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is requested by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to state that there was a clerical error in the bill (H. R. No. 1252) granting a pension to the minor children of Garrett W. Freer, which was passed yesterday. The bill provided that the pension should commence July 5, 1868. The date ought to have been July 5, 1863. If there be no objection the correction will be made in the engrossed bill.

There was no objection.

INTERNAL TAX BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise for the purpose of moving that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the tax bill; but before submitting that motion I move that all debate on the pending section in relation to banks be terminated in ten minutes after the House shall again resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the tax bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes.

The pending section was section one hundred and thirteen.

The pending question was on the amendment of Mr. PRICE, to strike out in line fourteen the words "one sixth," and insert in lieu thereof the words "one twelfth," so as to make the clause read as follows:

And a tax of one twelfth of one per cent. each month upon the average amount of circulation issued by any bank, association, corporation, company, or person, including as circulation all certified checks and all notes and other obligations calculated or intended to circulate or to be used as money, but not including that in the vault of the bank or redeemed and on deposit for said bank.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Chairman, I will detain the House for a moment only. I rose last evening for the purpose of getting some information from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] in reference to taxing deposits, and also to learn his views as to the propriety of having the Government funds deposited in banking institutions and private banks. I have since understood, and I thought last evening I was correct, that there was no such thing now as deposits of the Government in private banks. As I learn the facts there are yet national funds in national banks in many parts of the country, and especially in banks located where there are no offices of the sub-Treasury of the United States.

I stated last evening this was a great convenience to the Government and furnished facilities for the payment of Government claims and for the safety of collections in various of the internal revenue collection districts, while at the same time there was a check at all times in favor of the Government by the operations of the clearing-houses to which, especially in cities, the banks go. I was certain and I knew I was right when I stated to the committee, although we have a law restrictive in its character, as to making deposits of national funds in the banks, yet it is inevitable that deposits have to be made in banking institutions in different collection districts, the taxes to a large amount being paid in checks late in the business day when the sub-Treasury offices are closed, and the Government thus has the benefit of the watchfulness of the clearing-houses. Now, sir, while I stand here to-day a bank man, not as I was educated in the Whig party twenty-five years ago, and yet not by any means an anti-bank man as some of those around me were educated to be in the Locofoco party at the same period, still I am not for putting too severe restrictions upon the national banks. I am in favor of the law as it stands and in favor of the existing tax on circulation and deposits, but I do not want to see that tax increased. I know the circulation in some districts of the country and in some States is inadequate to the business done in them. I know in the city I have the honor in part to represent it is said by many that we have not a circulation adequate to the business of the city.

Mr. ELA. Has not one of your Philadelphia banks which had no use for its circulation sold enough to start a country bank for nine per cent. premium?

Mr. O'NEILL. I never heard of such a bank; but that is no point against the argument I make. I do not know of a banking institution of Philadelphia or of Pennsylvania that is to-day urging Congress not to put such a tax upon them as they and their customers should justly pay. I hope the tax upon circulation and deposits will not be increased.

I witnessed the attacks made years ago in Pennsylvania and other States upon the banks under the guise of protecting the people by legislation. These attacks were frequently made for the purpose of injuring these institutions, so necessary, when properly managed, to the business prosperity of the country; and my only interest in them now is to aid in saving them in their usefulness, and not to urge that they should be exempted from their due share of taxation.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to strike out "one sixth," and say "one fifth."

Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to enter into a general discussion of the propriety of banks, for that has nothing to do with the issue before the House. The question is whether the Government of the United States should receive interest on its deposits, the same as individuals. In other words, shall the Government of the United States require collaterals for their deposits, and those collaterals are in Government securities drawing six per cent. interest in gold, when at the same time we have millions of deposits in the banks. We pay the banks six per cent. in gold upon the collaterals, and they pay us not one cent upon the deposits of the Government, deposits upon which they make from six to ten per cent. on loans to individuals. It does seem to me strange that the bank can afford to pay private individuals for deposits from four to six per cent., and yet cannot pay the Government one cent.

Mr. O'NEILL. I speak from the stand-point of my own locality. I say, and I think my colleague from the first district [Mr. RANDALL] will concur with me, that this thing of paying interest on deposits in banks in Philadelphia is unknown.

Mr. LOGAN. Then all I have to say is that they had better deposit their money in Chicago or New York or Louisville or Cincinnati, where they do pay interest on deposits. I do not know what the system of banking may be in Philadelphia, but it seems to be different from the workings of the banking business everywhere else. I know that six per cent. on deposits has been and is being paid where I live, and I do not see why, if they are willing to pay six per cent. on my money (if I have any to deposit) they cannot pay the Government three per cent. for its money, when the banks are drawing interest from the Government from the mere fact of its having deposits in these banks.

Now, sir, I propose at the proper time to offer—or the Committee of Ways and Means will offer it—the amendment which I suggested last night, that while the provisions of the bill, so far as the circulation of banks is concerned, shall stand as they are, three per cent. shall be paid as taxation by the bank upon the amount of Government deposits; so that the Government may be receiving some interest for its deposits as well as individuals; especially from those banks to which the Government is paying six per cent. in gold for the mere privilege of having banks to circulate the Government's own notes, the Government being responsible for the redemption of those notes. I cannot understand why it is that when you ask a small rate of interest to be paid to the Government upon the deposits of the Government in these banks, you at once raise a hornet's nest in this House. If you undertake to do anything that seems to furnish money to the Government and take it from the grasping clutches of capitalists, the very men that can afford to pay taxes, it seems to arouse the indignation of certain gentlemen here. Now, so far as I am concerned, my theory is that we should not legislate for the rich alone, but seek to take the burden off the poor man. You ought not to put so much upon the poor man that he will be unable to bear it. Unless you seek to derive your revenue from the sources that are well able to afford to be taxed, you will be very likely to find yourself without revenue.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to oppose the amendment pro forma. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that an increase of the tax on circulation is much less productive of revenue than the same per cent. of increase of the tax on deposits. The report of the Comptroller of the Currency shows that in October last there were sixteen hundred and forty-three national banks, and that the total circulation was about two hundred and ninety-eight million dollars. The total deposits at that time amounted to $565,500,000, being nearly double the amount of circulation. It will be seen that one twenty-fourth of one per cent. on deposits will produce twice as much as one twenty-fourth of one per cent. on circulation. Therefore, if our object is to increase the amount of revenue derived from banks, we can do it much more effectually by increasing the tax on deposits than by increasing it on circulation, as proposed in this bill. I am surprised that it should be proposed to raise the tax which is already highest, and let the lower tax stand as it is now fixed by law.

Another point, which has not been sufficiently considered in this debate. There is at the present, in my judgment, no more serious evil connected with our banking system than the fact that the banks in the great money centers, such as New York, are allowed to receive interest on deposits. The result is, all the country banks deposit their money in these banks and check against it at the same time that they are receiving interest on it, and are thus enabled substantially to use their money twice. While this is permitted they will of course not have money to lend at home to business men, even on good business paper, except at an exorbitant rate of interest. The result is, that all over the West, and everywhere in the rural districts, the currency is relatively very scarce, although it is very plenty, even a plethora, in all great money centers. There has not been a time in three years when money could not be had on call at a very low rate of interest, as low as four per cent., and even lower in the city of New York, but it could not be had for sixty or ninety days without a much higher rate, even on the very best security. The reason was that currency was being used in Wall street in gambling operations, based on the rise and fall of stocks and gold. It is loaned on call for that business, when it would not be loaned on long time for the very best security. For these reasons I insist that we ought to throw the burden of taxation rather on deposits than on circulation. I am not sorry that the Committee of Ways and Means propose to get more revenue out of circulation, but I shall insist if they do they must correspondingly raise the tax on deposits.

It is generally conceded that deposits serve many if not all the purposes of currency. Mr. Walker, in his able work on Public Wealth, recently published, insists that all deposits are to be added as a clear addition to the total circulation of the country. If this view be correct, the Committee of Ways and Means ought to show the present difference in the rate of tax or the two should be continued; rather than to ask us—as they do in this bill—to make that difference greater—

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. All debate on this section is closed by order of the House.

Mr. LOGAN. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PRICE. Is the question now on my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. PRICE. And if my amendment prevails it will leave the law just as it is, will it not?

The CHAIRMAN. It will.

The question was taken on Mr. PRICE's amendment, and there were—ayes 42, noes 41; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. PRICE, and HOOPER of Massachusetts, were appointed.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to ask the Chair a question. Is a vote in the affirmative a vote to keep the tax where it now is under the existing law?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. And a vote in the negative is in favor of increasing the tax.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to ask the Chair whether a vote for this amendment will keep the tax at one per cent., and a vote against it make the tax two per cent.?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a question of order. That is not a parliamentary question.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 51, noes 51.

The Chairman voted in the affirmative.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment:

Page 165, section one hundred and thirteen, line nine, after the word "banking" insert as follows: "and a tax of one-fourth of one per cent. each month on the average amount of all deposits of public money in their possession to the credit of the Treasurer or of the disbursing officer of the United States."

Mr. GRISWOLD. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "amount" the words "in excess of $25,000."

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. SCHENCK's amendment; and being put, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer the following amendment from the Committee of Ways and Means to make the section conform to the amendment just adopted:

Page 165, section one hundred and thirteen, line five, after the word "money" insert the words "other than public moneys of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the section:

Provided further, That none of the money herein authorized to be collected shall be deposited in a national bank in any city or place where there is located the Treasurer or an Assistant Treasurer of the United States. All public moneys collected and received in any city or place for the Government shall be deposited with such Treasurer or Assistant Treasurer, shall be subject only to the draft of the Secretary of the Treasury or the Treasurer of the United States, as provided by law, and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury from time to time shall deem expedient and establish; and any public officer violating this provision of the law and depositing public money otherwise than is herein directed, and any other person who shall aid therein, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be fined a sum not exceeding $5,000, and be imprisoned for a term not exceeding three years, or either, at the discretion of the court.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a point of order. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. SCHENCK. The first part of this amendment, if it were separated from the rest, I think would be in order, and I should be in favor of it. But the last part of the amendment, proposing to amend the sub-Treasury laws, I think tends to make the amendment out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. Very well; I will move that portion of my amendment to which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] does not object.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to modify his amendment by inserting after the word "sub-Treasurer" the words "or other public depository."

Mr. RANDALL. The national banks are public depositories.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the amendment as now submitted be read.

The amendment was again read, being to add to the section the following:

Provided further, That none of the money authorized to be collected under this act shall be deposited in a national bank in any city or place where there is located a Treasurer or an Assistant Treasurer of the United States.

Mr. O'NEILL. I want to ask my colleague [Mr. RANDALL] a question.

The CHAIRMAN. No further debate is in order.

Mr. RANDALL. I could not answer any question if I would.

Mr. LYNCH. I move to amend the amendment by adding to it the following:

And provided further, That no public moneys shall be deposited in any bank in any city where there is located a Treasurer or Assistant Treasurer of the United States.

Mr. RANDALL. That is the same as my amendment.

Mr. LYNCH. No, it is not. The amendment of the gentleman applies to moneys collected under this act; my amendment to the amendment relates to any public moneys.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. LYNCH to the amendment of Mr. RANDALL; and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. RANDALL.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move to amend the amendment by adding to it the words "provided such deposits shall be made daily."

Mr. RANDALL. That is provided for elsewhere.

Mr. O'NEILL. Then I will withdraw my amendment.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. RANDALL; and it was agreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to amend that portion of this section providing for a tax on the average amount of deposits, by striking out the words "one twenty-fourth" and inserting "one twelfth."

Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "one twelfth" and inserting "one sixth."

The question was then taken upon the amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to; there being, upon a division—ayes twenty-two, noes not counted.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. MAYNARD, and it was agreed to; there being, upon a division—ayes sixty-three, noes not counted.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have another amendment to offer.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I have an amendment to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] will be recognized, being a member of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not offer these amendments as coming from the Committee of Ways and Means, but as my individual amendments.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I will wait until the gentleman from Tennessee has offered his amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to amend the portion of this section providing for a tax on the capital of those banks, by striking out the words "beyond the average amount invested in United States bonds;" so that that portion of the section will read as follows:

And a tax of one twenty-fourth of one per cent. each month, as aforesaid, upon the capital of any bank, association, company, or corporation, and on the capital employed by any person in the business of banking.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. MAYNARD, and it was not agreed to; there being upon a division—ayes twenty, noes not counted.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. In order to perfect this section, I move to amend that portion which relates to the tax upon capital by inserting after the word "corporation" the words "engaged in the business of banking;" so that that portion of the section will read as follows:

And a tax of one twenty-fourth of one per cent. each month, as aforesaid, upon the capital of any bank, association, company, or corporation engaged in the business of banking, and on the capital employed by any person in the business of banking, beyond the average amount invested in United States bonds.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to further amend this section by striking out the following:

Provided, That the deposits in associations or companies known as provident institutions, savings-banks, savings funds, or savings institutions, having no capital stock and doing no other business than receiving deposits to be loaned or invested for the sole benefit of the parties making such deposits, without profit or compensation to the association or company, shall be exempt from tax on so much of their deposits as they have invested in securities of the United States, and on all deposits less than $500 made in the name of any one person; and the returns required to be made by such provident institutions and savings-banks shall be made on the first Monday of January and July of each year, in such form and manner as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

I think these deposits in the savings-banks should be taxed the same as deposits in other banks.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. BLAINE, and it was not agreed to; there being, upon a division—ayes thirty-three, noes not counted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to further amend this section by inserting after the clause providing for a tax on circulation the following:

And a tax of one per cent. each half year on the principal of all bonds issued by the United States, owned by any bank, including the bonds deposited by said banks with the Treasurer of the United States, to secure circulation or deposits.

The question was taken upon the amendment; and upon a division there were—ayes 10, noes 58; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN, and Mr. HUBBARD of West Virginia, were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 25, noes 75.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 114. And be it further enacted, That every national banking association, State bank, or State banking association, corporation, company, or person engaged in the business of banking, shall pay a tax of ten per cent. on the amount of notes of any person, State bank, or State banking association, town, city, or other municipal corporation, used for circulation and paid out by them; and such tax shall be assessed and paid in such manner as shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend by inserting after the word "association" the word "State;" so as to make the section read:

That every national banking association, State bank, or State banking association, corporation, company, or person engaged in the business of banking, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRELL. I move to amend by adding at the end of the section the following:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to banks, persons, or institutions which are in liquidation, and which have not issued any notes for circulation for a period of more than one year.

My object in offering this amendment is to prevent the levying of this tax on institutions that have for a considerable time ceased to do business, having gone into liquidation.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think there is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PETERS. I move to amend by inserting after the word "pay," in line four, the words "on and after January 1, 1870." The object of this amendment is to postpone the operation of this ten per cent. tax until the 1st of January, 1870. Mr. Chairman, this section introduced in a bill which is designed to raise revenue is on its face entirely prohibitory. The object of this tax of ten per cent. is to strangle the State banks, if the few of them now remaining in existence have any spark of life left. I would prefer that this section should be altogether stricken out, or that the tax should be reduced to a very small percentage; but I presume that this proposition for a postponement of the tax may possibly be more acceptable to the committee.

I venture to say, Mr. Chairman, that the object of this assessment of ten per cent. in previous internal revenue acts was to encourage or perhaps to drive the capital of the country into the national banking system. Has not that object been sufficiently attained? The capital of the country has gone into this system until now there is no more opportunity for investment in that direction. How has this system left some portions of the country in relation to banking facilities? I am looking at this question more particularly from the stand-point of Maine; and I suppose that many other portions of the country are similarly situated. It has several times been stated on this floor that New England and New York have the larger part of the national banking capital. Allow me to say that when it is stated that New England has in large proportion this banking capital it should be said that Massachusetts has it, and especially that the city of Boston has it. Why, sir, in the State of Maine our quota of the national banking capital is less than $9,000,000, while the Commonwealth of Massachusetts has about eighty million, the little State of Rhode Island about twenty million, and the State of Connecticut about twenty-five million. This has arisen from the fact that during the war a great deal of capital found its way to our large business centers, the mercantile men in those places being quicker-scented. I can say for the State of Maine, especially the eastern part of it, that we are almost wholly without banking facilities. Our State banks are hardly alive; they are dying of the debility and consumption to which they have fallen victims under our previous revenue laws; and after continued struggling we have found no opportunity to get into the national banking system. Business men in the city of Bangor are now obliged to get their banking facilities, in a large degree, from the city of Boston, two hundred miles distant. The result is that while money may be worth from three to five per cent. in the city of Boston, yet in the city of Bangor, many of us in that part of the State being compelled to put ourselves into the hands of the brokers, and be consumed and swallowed up by their rapacity, money is worth from nine to fifteen per cent., and that, too, upon first-class securities.

That is our situation. The national banking system is at present a monopoly; its facilities are not diffused extensively enough. What is the remedy? Either to authorize an increase of the banking capital and give us a part of it or to take off or postpone this enormous taxation of the State banks. The postponement of the tax till 1870 would not tend to bring into existence new banks. But very few of the State banks are now left in existence. These have associated together, and brought a suit, now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, to test the constitutionality of this tax.

Mr. SCHENCK. The effect of this section, Mr. Chairman, is just as represented by the gentleman from Maine. It is a provision which imposes such a tax upon State bank notes issued by cities and other corporations and by States to serve as money in the use of other banking institutions so as to prevent that issue and drive them out of circulation. Well, sir, it is not a new idea. The law was passed in 1865. It was then made prospective, and took effect on the 1st day of August, 1866, and it has been in full operation, so far as the notes of said banks were concerned, with a view to that policy, ever since the 1st day of August, 1866, now two years. Last year, in 1867, an amendment was made which extended its provisions to the notes issued by any town, city, or municipal corporation. This was an amendment which passed without objection on the representation made that in New Orleans and elsewhere municipal corporations were issuing notes to serve as money.

As the bill now presents the case for the consideration of the committee, it does not alter the law of 1865, which went into operation on the 1st of August, 1866, nor the law of 1867, which extended its provisions to the notes put out by municipal corporations, but only adds a single provision so as to embrace also notes issued to serve as money by States; for it so happens, we have ascertained in one or two of the southern States they have issued notes to serve as money. Then there is nothing at all now or strange in this proposition, and the gentleman is proposing to postpone to 1870 the operation of a law which was originally passed in 1865, and went into effect in 1866, which did go into effect the 1st of August, 1866, and has been in operation and full force ever since. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. PETERS. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. PIKE. I renew it. Mr. Chairman, there is no reason why the House should not give attention to this amendment, and I think favorable attention to it. When we come back to specie payments it seems to be the general opinion that the bank law will cease to be a monopoly. As the bank law was founded on the free banking law of New York anybody could bank on the deposit of United States bonds, and when we come back to specie payments anybody can bank on the deposit of national bonds. In the meantime we are hedged in by this iron restriction of $300,000,000. The proposition of my colleague is, that pending this time we shall allow State banks, what may be left of them, to run free of this odious tax; a tax, by the way, wrested from the proper idea of taxation, this being for the purpose of prohibition and not for revenue. So it is, in effect, a tax in the nature of a prohibition. Let up on this until we resume specie payments and the free banking system comes in, and you may destroy the State banks. I hope, in the mean time, this whole brood of national banks will be dissevered from the General Government, where they do not belong, and specie take their place, so that we shall have in a few words the axiom that prevailed during our war, that gold shall be national and paper sectional. I want this Government to sever its connection from paper in all shapes, whether in "greenbacks" or national bank bills, and place itself upon the constitutional currency of gold and silver. Then, if any of the States wish to deal in paper currency, let them do it. Let the national currency then be nothing but gold and silver.

Now, we have this currency of the General Government which is now so contracted and restricted that localities that did not at the time come in with the keen scent of the capitalists of the city are stripped of the circulation they had formerly. My district has not the circulation it had formerly, and they are compelled to go outside to the moneyed centers for circulation. The amendment of my colleague would accomplish this purpose, and, while it would be temporary in its nature, if the banking system is to be continued it would be a convenience to the localities and would injure nobody. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Maine. The effect of this amendment is to revive the old State banks which more than two years ago we virtually destroyed by our legislation.

Mr. PETERS. I would ask the gentleman how can that be? The suspension of the tax for a year and a little over would hardly be an inducement for new banks to go into operation.

Mr. ALLISON. The effect of the amendment will be to send over the country a State bank circulation which is now prohibited. If we are to have any more circulation let us provide for it in the shape of our own Government notes if we have not got enough now. But I rose chiefly to say that if we want to make any progress in this bill we must not be constantly making formal amendments and then speaking on the general subject. And I give notice that hereafter I shall object to these amendments unless there is substance in them.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have tried that myself.

Mr. ALLISON. I yield the remainder of the time to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to state a fact which I think will be of interest to the committee in connection with this proposition, which is manifestly a step toward reviving the State banks. The best illustration of the bad condition of the currency out of which we have come by the establishment of the national banks, is seen in this curious fact: in 1821 there were $22,000,000 in the Treasury of the United States not drawn against. In January of that year interest on the public debt to the amount of $500,000 fell due. The Government was compelled at that time to receive into the Treasury the notes of the various State banks which were current in the localities of the banks. And yet, out of the wretched stuff that made up the $22,000,000 in the Treasury, the Secretary could not call $500,000 that would be received for the Government interest. The result was that the Secretary of the Treasury actually negotiated a loan of $500,000 in order to enable the Government to meet its obligations, although he had in the vaults what professed to be $22,000,000. That is an exhibition of the kind of currency these State banks gave us, and if revived, would give us again. I will state further, that there was a time under the old State bank system when there were one hundred and eighty broken banks in this country; when one fourth of all the currency afloat in the United States was either worthless or at so great a discount as to be almost worthless. I hope we shall have the wisdom to keep far away from the wretched system from which the war happily delivered us.

Mr. PRICE. A single question. Had we not better kill these national banks now, and go back to the happy financial state to which my friend alludes?

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was on the amendment of Mr. PETERS.

Mr. PETERS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out seventeen and inserting eighteen. For business purposes the country must have a certain amount of banking capital. If the Government of the United States will allow that amount of banking capital, well enough. In my opinion we have not got it. If the Government has not the right to supply it, I say we ought to leave the right within the States, and not strangle and destroy these banks by excessive taxation. I do not propose to revive the old State banks, but merely to let those now in existence remain long enough to let them renew the attempt to get into that system which in Maine they have tried very hard to do. The Legislature has been renewing from year to year the charters of four State banks now left in existence for the purpose of allowing them to find an opportunity, through the benevolence of Congress, to come under that national system. But if that system never comes, then I say the State ought to be allowed to grant the banks banking privileges which Congress has as yet neglected to provide.

Mr. PIKE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that his argument, running back fifty years, reminds me of the argument made when the greenback system was proposed going back to the continental currency. We heard the argument then against the greenback currency, that in continental times a breakfast cost $500 in continental money. Arguments which go back fifty, seventy-five, and eighty years are musty, stale, and unworthy the attention of the committee.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman from Maine complains of the condition of things in that State. Now, that can partly be accounted for by the report from the Comptroller of the Currency. If you look to Maine you will find that she has sixty-one of these national banks with an aggregate capital of $9,000,000, and that they have remaining on hand $1,500,000 of undivided profits and surplus. They have $1,500,000 of their money deposited in national banks in Boston. It is not to be wondered at that even if they have but $9,000,000—whereas they had a much larger capital in the time of the State banks—they should in some degree be contributing to this condition of embarrassment and pinching necessity for money when they keep their money locked up in that way. They have it deposited down in Boston for convenience, it may be said, to draw against, but probably, as our western banks do too often, for convenience in speculations, to be carried on there for the benefit of those connected with the bank and the bank itself, instead of keeping it at home to accommodate their neighbors.

Mr. LYNCH. I want to say to the gentleman from Ohio what he ought to know as chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that the banks are required to keep a reserve in lawful money, and that the same law which requires them to do that allows them to keep a certain amount of this reserve in these business centers in which they are obliged to redeem their circulation. Boston is one of them, and therefore the amount which the gentleman finds of deposits of the banks of Maine in the banks of Boston is for the purpose of the redemption of their circulation as required by the currency act.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. SELYE. I desire to submit some remarks upon this subject; but inasmuch as the time for debate is limited, I will simply ask leave to print them.

There was no objection; and the leave was granted. [See Appendix.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent that all debate may be closed on this section.

There was no objection; and it was so ordered.

Mr. PETERS. I move to amend the section in line four by striking out the words "ten per cent. on the" and inserting "one per cent. per annum on the average;" so that it shall read:

That every national banking association, State bank, or State banking association, corporation, company, or person engaged in the business of banking, shall pay a tax of one per cent. per annum on the average amount of notes of any person, State bank, or State banking association, town, city, or other municipal corporation, used for circulation, &c.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. I rise for the purpose of advocating that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question has been taken; and, moreover, all debate has been closed on this section by the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. I did not so understand, or I should certainly have objected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated the proposition very distinctly, and no objection was made.

Mr. WARD. I hope that by unanimous consent the gentleman will be allowed to proceed.

Mr. SCHENCK. We have no power to do that.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. Then I offer the following as a substitute for the section:

Provided, That no greater tax shall be collected of State banks upon their circulation than collected from national banks.

On the amendment, there were—ayes 31, noes 45; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, and MAYNARD.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 31, noes 65.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I move to amend by inserting the following as a new section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That there shall be levied, collected and paid a tax of one per cent, per annum upon the amount of United States securities represented by interest-bearing bonds payable at some future day, whether held by any person, bank, association, company, or corporation. And a true and accurate return of the amount of said securities shall be made and rendered annually by each person, bank, association, company, or corporation to the assessor of the district in which such bank, association, company, or corporation may be located, or in which such person may reside, with a declaration annexed thereto, verified by the oath or affirmation of such person, or of the president or cashier of such bank, association, company or corporation, in such form and manner as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. And for any refusal or neglect to make or to render such return and pay the tax, any such bank, association, company, corporation, or person so in default shall be subject to and pay a penalty of $100 beside the additional penalty and forfeitures in other cases provided by law; and in default of such return the amount of the aforesaid securities subject to tax shall be estimated by the assessor or assistant assessor on the best information he can obtain. And the tax herein provided for shall be assessed, collected, and paid upon the amount of the aforesaid securities held on the 1st day of April and be due and payable on the 1st day of May of each year; and to any sum annually due and unpaid after the 1st day of May, as aforesaid, and for ten days after notice and demand thereof by the collector, there shall be levied in addition thereto, the sum of five per cent. on the amount of the tax unpaid, and interest at the rate of one per cent. per month upon said tax from the time the same became due, as a penalty, except from the estates of deceased, insane, or insolvent persons.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been closed.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. This is offered as a new section, and I would like to explain it.

The CHAIRMAN. The action of the committee closing debate cuts off all debate until the next section of the bill has been read. Amendments offered now are considered as amendments to the pending section upon which debate has been closed.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. This is entirely new matter.

Mr. SCHENCK. Every amendment, I believe, may be supposed to contain new matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer the following as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That there shall be assessed and collected on all bonds, the interest on which is payable at the Treasury of the United States, a tax of one and one half of one per cent. per annum on the principal of such bonds; one half of such tax on all of such bonds, the interest on which is, or shall be, payable semi-annually, shall be withheld by the proper officer of the Treasury from the semi-annually accruing interest or coupons at the time the same shall be paid, and the tax aforesaid on such of said bonds the interest on which is payable annually shall be withheld as aforesaid from the interest or coupons at the time of the payment thereof; the tax hereby assessed shall be withheld from the interest or coupons becoming due on and after the 1st day of November, 1863.

On agreeing to Mr. HOLMAN's amendment to the amendment, there were—ayes 10, noes 58; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. HOLMAN and BLAINE.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 25, noes 72.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. If the committee will consent, I will withdraw the proposition I have presented, so that I may offer it at some time hereafter when it can be explained, that the House may vote on it understandingly.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I object to the withdrawal of the amendment.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. The objection will only make it necessary for me to change slightly the verbiage of the amendment when I offer it hereafter.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object. I want a vote on the proposition.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. As the committee appears determined to force a vote on this proposition, I ask unanimous consent to make an explanation occupying three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee, under the rule, has not power, even by unanimous consent, to extend the time to which debate has been limited by the House; but the Chair has not undertaken to enforce the rule where the unanimous consent of the committee has been expressly given, and he will not do so in this case.

Mr. SCHENCK. I must object. If we give unanimous consent for a speech on that side of one minute, three minutes, or five minutes, we must, of course, give unanimous consent for a reply, and so we shall be involved in a debate after debate has been stopped on the section.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the amendment by adding thereto the following:

And from all coupons hereafter presented at the Treasury after this provision shall take effect the tax herein prescribed shall be withheld by the proper officer of the Treasury.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

On agreeing to the amendment of Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia, there were—ayes 22, noes 41; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia, and Mr. MOORE.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 42, noes 54.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

No further amendment being offered, the next section was read, as follows:

Brokers.

SEC. 115. And be it further enacted, That there shall be paid on all sales made by brokers, banks, or bankers, whether made for the benefit of others or on their own account, the following taxes, that is to say: upon all sales and contracts for the sale of stock, bonds, gold and silver bullion and coin, promissory notes or other securities, a tax at the rate of two cents for every $100 of the amount of such sales or contracts; and on all sales and contracts for sale negotiated and made by any person, firm, or company, not paying a special tax as a broker, bank, or banker, of any gold or silver bullion, coin, promissory notes, stock, bond, or other securities, not his or their own property, there shall be paid a tax at the rate of five cents for every $100 of the amount of such sales or contracts; and on every sale and contract for sale, as aforesaid, there shall be made, signed, and delivered by the seller to the buyer a bill or memorandum of such sale or contract, on which there shall be affixed a lawful stamp or stamps in value equal to the amount of tax on such sale, to be determined by the rates of tax before mentioned; and in computing the amount of the stamp tax in any case herein provided for, any fractional part of $100 of value or amount on which tax is computed shall be accounted at $100. And every bill or memorandum of sale, or contract of sale, before mentioned, shall show the date thereof, the name of the seller, the amount of the sale or contract, and the matter or thing to which it refers. And any person or persons liable to pay the tax as herein provided, or any one who acts in the matter as agent or broker for such person or persons, who shall make any such sale or contract, or who shall, in pursuance of any sale or contract, deliver or receive any stocks, bonds, bullion, coin, promissory notes, or other securities, without a bill or memorandum thereof as herein required, or who shall deliver or receive such bill or memorandum without having the proper stamps affixed thereto, shall forfeit and pay to the United States a penalty of $500 for each and every offense where the tax so evaded or attempted to be evaded, does not exceed $100 and a penalty of $1,000 when such tax shall exceed $100, which may be recovered with costs in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, at any time within one year after the liability to such penalty shall have been incurred; and the penalty recovered shall be awarded and distributed by the court between the United States and the informer, if there be any, as provided by law, who, in the judgment of the court, shall have first given information of the violation of the law for which recovery is had: Provided, That where it shall appear that the omission to affix the proper stamp was not with intent to evade the provisions of this section, said penalty shall not be incurred. And the provisions of law in relation to stamp duties in schedule B of this act shall apply to the stamp taxes herein imposed upon sales and contracts of sales made by brokers, banks, or bankers, and others as aforesaid. And there shall be paid monthly on all sales by commercial brokers of any goods, wares, or merchandise, a tax of one twentieth of one per cent. upon the amount of such sales; and on or before the 10th day of each month, every commercial broker shall make a return to the assistant assessor of the district of the gross amount of such sales as aforesaid for the preceding month, in form and manner as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue: Provided, That in estimating sales of goods, wares, and merchandise for the purposes of this section, any sales made by or through another broker upon which a tax has been paid shall not be estimated and included as sold by the broker for whom the sale was made.

No amendment was offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section, unless objection be made, will be considered by paragraphs.

Mr. ROBINSON. When would it be in order, Mr. Chairman, to move to strike out the whole schedule contained in the next section?

The CHAIRMAN. If the section is considered by paragraphs, the motion to strike out must be made after each paragraph has been read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Tax on the use and possession of certain articles.

SEC. 116. And be it further enacted, That there shall be levied, annually, on every carriage, gold watch, and billiard-table, and on all gold or silver plate, the tax or sums of money set down in figures against the same, respectively or otherwise specified, and set forth in schedule A, hereto annexed, to be paid by the person owning, possessing, or keeping the same, on the 1st day in March in each year.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend by inserting after "gold watch" the words "musical instrument."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move to strike out the paragraph which has just been read. I would have preferred to move, if it had been in order, to strike out the whole series; and, indeed, if it were in order, I would move to strike out the whole bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. You are a friend of the bill! [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON. I am not, sir. I wish to say, with all due respect to the Committee of Ways and Means, that any committee reporting to Congress such a bill as this, extending as it does over three hundred and sixty pages, when it might be fully set forth in twenty pages, should be sent for twenty years to the Dry Tortugas, or the Wet Tortugas, if there is such a place. I rise for the purpose of moving to strike out this paragraph for the sake of getting a test vote which may decide whether we shall go any further with this bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman wants to curtail the bill, he had better move to strike out a longer paragraph. This contains only eight lines. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON. Short meter is just as agreeable to me as long meter on this matter.

Mr. Chairman, I propose as each paragraph is read to move to strike it out. We have been engaged I know not how many days or weeks on this bill, and we have only got one third or one half way through it. At the rate we are progressing I do not believe it possible that we shall be able to get through this bill during July. It will then go to the Senate, where it will take all of August and September, and will be returned to this House somewhere about November or December, when we are reassembling after the recess. I wish to say nothing disrespectful to the Committee of Ways and Means; but if we were in the House I should move to recommit the bill, with positive instructions to prepare a bill not to exceed twenty pages—

Mr. MULLINS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. [Laughter.] What is the question under debate?

The CHAIRMAN. Lines one to eight inclusive, on page 171.

Mr. MULLINS. General debate is not in order, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman raise a point of order?

Mr. MULLINS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order—that general debate applicable to the whole bill is not in order on this particular paragraph.

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MULLINS] is so much in favor of large measures that he had better reserve his "pint" of order till it becomes a quart. [Laughter.]

Mr. MULLINS. I am good for a gallon for Ireland.

Mr. ROBINSON. My friend is also from Ireland. He has dropped the "Mc" and added an "g."

I will confine myself now to striking out this paragraph. I have already stated a part of my reasons. I shall move to strike out each of the remaining sections as they come up, so, if possible, we may get rid of this bill altogether and substitute for it a bill or resolution simply providing that the tax on distilled spirits shall be fifty cents a gallon and the abominable practice shall be abolished of making rectifiers prove when they have whisky on hand that it is innocent whisky. In order that we may get rid of this bill I shall move to strike out these sections and paragraphs one after the other, so that in the end the bill shall be sent back to the Committee of Ways and Means with instructions to condense the whole thing to the fewest necessary provisions and in the fewest words. I make the prophecy that this bill in anything like its present shape will never pass either House of Congress, and therefore the time we now spend upon it is really valuable time thrown away.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York has expressed some strong opinions about this bill. If we felt more than we do what he has said it would hurt the committee considerably, but as it is we are not discouraged. We have had nothing thus far but opposition from the gentleman. He has given notice of a most novel mode of economizing the time of House. He gives notice, instead of contenting himself with voting against the passage of the bill when it gets into the House, he will move to strike out paragraph after paragraph and section after section. It is like kicking the bill to death by grasshoppers, [laughter.] It is in my judgment a rather strange way of saving time. Now, I wonder at the gentleman's moving this amendment considering that he has turned to be a Democrat. He wants to relieve from tax gold watches, gold plate, carriages—

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman is not respectful, especially when he himself is known to have turned. He has gone over to the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman and I were Whigs together, and he has gone off to the Democrats.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is the gentleman who has turned over to the Radicals. I remain in favor of the old Whig doctrines of the Constitution.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will relieve him of any bad feeling on the subject, and show what kind of a Democrat he has become. He wishes to relieve from tax gold watches, plate, carriages—

Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire. I call the gentleman to order. This debate does not touch the merits of the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am talking on the very matter. The gentleman from New York stands here to-day asking us to take off the tax on gold and silver plate, gold watches, billiard-tables, and so on.

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to take the tax off gold and silver plate out of compliment to the leaders on the other side.

Mr. SCHENCK. He wishes to strike out that part of the bill which taxes articles ordinarily esteemed to be articles of luxury. He wishes to save the rich and to increase the burdens upon the poorer classes. If I have done wrong in saying that he has turned a Democrat, I have at least shown what kind of a Democrat he is. I hope the amendment will not prevail. If we are to have any taxation it should be imposed upon these very articles that are proposed to be stricken out.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ROBINSON. Can I say a word?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not ask a favor, I demand a right.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the right of the Chair to enforce the rules.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Chair will understand that I have a right—

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to propose a parliamentary question, which the Chair will rule in or order if he hears me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his parliamentary question.

Mr. ROBINSON. Seeing my friend from Ohio and I were formerly good Clay Whigs together—

The CHAIRMAN. (bringing down the hammer.) The question is on the amendment—

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Those in favor of the amendment will say ay; those of a contrary opinion no. The ayes have it, and the amendment is lost.

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to a point of order. I have risen three times to withdraw the proposition, and the Chair absolutely refused to allow me. That was my point of order, that I had a right to withdraw it. Never, sir, in this House has any member been bawled down before when he rose to withdraw his motion. The Chairman here brought down the hammer.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask whether I have not a right to withdraw the motion which I made?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will make a statement. The gentleman rose, and the Chair very civilly stated to him the condition in which he was placed—that it was his duty to enforce the rule. The gentleman then stated that he rose to ask a parliamentary question. The Chair asked him to state it. The gentleman then turned to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] and proceeded with the debate which had already been closed, because a point of order had been made upon it.

Mr. ROBINSON. The point of order I made was this—

[Cries of "order."]

The CHAIRMAN. Thereupon the Chair rapped the gentleman down and proceeded to state the question of order, as he will always do on like occasions.

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to say then—

[Cries of "order."]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed.

The CLERK. "Schedule C"—

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed.

The Clerk read as follows:

Carriage, phaeton, carryall, rockaway, or other like carriage, and any coach, hackney coach, omnibus, or four-wheeled carriage, the body of which rests upon springs of any description, which may be kept for use, for hire, or for passengers, and which shall not be used exclusively in husbandry or for the transportation of merchandise, valued at exceeding $300, and not above $500 each, including harness used therewith, six dollars.

Carriages of like description, valued above $500, each, ten dollars.

On gold watches, composed wholly or in part of gold or gilt, kept for use, valued at $100 or less, each, one dollar.

On gold watches, composed wholly or in part of gold or gilt, kept for use, valued at above $100, each, two dollars.

On pianofortes, organs, melodeons, harps, or other parlor musical instruments, kept for use, (not including those placed in churches or schools,) valued at not less than $100 and not above $200, each, two dollars.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to strike out in the last line but one "$100 and not above;" so that it will read "valued at not less than $200, each two dollars."

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Why do you decrease the tax on pianos from that imposed by the old law?

Mr. SCHENCK. The old law let them off altogether. They have never been restored. By reference to page 96 of the revenue law the gentleman will find that in schedule A pianos were not taxed at all.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to amend by adding "when the value is over $400, six dollars."

Mr. ROBINSON. I move to strike out the entire paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be in order after the paragraph is perfected.

The question was taken on Mr. LOUGHRIDGE's amendment; and it was disagreed to—ayes eleven, noes not counted.

Mr. ROBINSON. I now move to strike out the whole paragraph; and on that motion I want to say one word. I wished, a few minutes ago, to finish one sentence by adding to what I had already said, "I withdraw my motion," and asking the parliamentary question if I had not the right to do so; having been denied that courtesy I propose to go on with what I originally proposed, and move to strike out every paragraph. I had three words to say, and being denied an opportunity of saying then, very unjustly, in my opinion, I shall move to strike out each paragraph.

Mr. WARD. I call the gentleman to order for using language of that kind to the Chair.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let the language be taken down to which the gentleman objects. [Cries of "Oh, no!"]

Mr. WARD. I withdraw the point of order.

The question was taken on Mr. ROBINSON's motion; and there were—ayes 8, noes 75; no quorum voting.

Mr. ROBINSON. I insist on a vote; and I shall do it on every question, because I think I have been unjustly treated.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ROBINSON and HOPKINS were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 7, noes 91.

So the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to add to the paragraph the words, "where the value of the piano is over $500, five dollars." Mr. Chairman, I do not know on what principle this is arranged. If we desire to make this law odious to the people, we are going in the right direction to do it. We tax a man who has a pinchbeck watch worth less than fifty dollars, one dollar, while we only tax the man who has a piano worth $1,000, two dollars. Now, if that is justice, I do not know what justice is. Our policy ought to be to tax the rich and those who are able to bear taxation, and to have something like equality, and if this bill is not of that character, it shall not receive my vote. I should like the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to give me some reason why a piano worth $1,000 should be taxed only one dollar, while a man who owns a pinchbeck watch worth fifty dollars is taxed for it one dollar. I trust my amendment will be adopted. We have refused to tax United States bonds, and we ought to tax these luxuries.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move to strike out the last word of the paragraph, and I shall proceed, within my five minutes, to give my reasons for wishing to strike it out. This is a musical concern, and those that "have no music in their souls are fit for treason, stratagem," and some other things. If the Chair will allow me to say one word introductory to my remarks, I will say that when I was on the floor a few minutes ago I had commenced and said three words—

Mr. MULLINS. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman must direct his remarks to the subject under consideration. I insist on order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The gentleman must speak to his amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then I shall proceed in order; and the point on which I was talking was about these musical instruments. I did not intend out of this musical harmony to produce discord, and although when I rose to withdraw my amendment and had only said three words I was interrupted, and, as I consider, contrary to the usual courtesy of this House, yet I will not revenge myself on the Committee of the Whole, and I therefore shall not persevere, as I have a right to do, in speaking and insisting on a vote on each paragraph and section.

No further amendment was offered.

The following clauses were then read:

Billiard-tables kept for use, each, ten dollars.

Provided, That billiard tables kept for hire, and upon which a special tax has been imposed, shall not be required to pay the tax on billiard-tables kept for use as aforesaid.

On plate, of gold, kept for use, per ounce troy, fifty cents.

On plate, of silver, kept for use, per ounce troy, five cents.

Provided, That silver spoons or plate of silver used by one family to an amount not exceeding forty ounces troy belonging to any one person, plate belonging to religious societies, and souvenirs and keepsakes actually given and received as such and not kept for use; also, all premiums awarded as a token of merit by any agricultural society, corporation, or association of persons, for any purpose whatever, shall be exempt from tax.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would suggest that the clauses just read relating to plate, &c., be amended by substituting the word "avoirdupois" for the word "troy" where it occurs. My reason for that amendment is that the means of weighing in general use throughout the country has reference to avoirdupois weight instead of troy weight. The avoirdupois ounce is a little less than the troy ounce, and my amendment may have the effect of decreasing a little the income to be derived from this source. But I think the convenience to result from the change I propose will justify the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I would ask my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] if the troy weight is not generally marked or stamped on gold and silver plate?

Mr. MAYNARD. I know that technically the weight of gold and silver articles from most establishments, not all of them, but from the large establishments, is marked on the articles, but not in ounces. It is sometimes stamped so indifferently or imperfectly that it is difficult to ascertain what it is. I presume but few persons would make a return of their silver plate, &c., without weighing it themselves, and their domestic means of weighing always have reference to avoirdupois and not troy weight.

Mr. ALLISON. My own impression is that the change proposed would create more confusion than would counterbalance the benefit that might result from it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think troy weight is the proper weight for the precious metals. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] speaks now, as he did in the Committee of Ways and Means, of the difficulty of calculating the troy weight by persons ordinarily.

Mr. MAYNARD. Very well; it is not worth a contest; I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent that this section, and the schedule accompanying it, being schedule A, be taken from this place and inserted in the bill just before section one hundred and two, relating to stamps. By a mistake in putting the sheets of this bill together for the printer, this schedule A was printed after schedule B, relating to stamps.

No objection was made, and the change was made accordingly.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to insert, as an additional section, to immediately precede section one hundred and seventeen, the following:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That there shall be assessed and collected on all bonds, the interest on which is payable at the Treasury of the United States, a tax of one per cent. per annum on the principal thereof, one half of which tax on such of said bonds, the interest on which is payable semi-annually, shall be withheld by the proper officer of the Treasury from the semi-annually accruing interest or coupons, at the time of the payment of the same, and the tax aforesaid on all of such bonds, the interest on which is payable annually, shall in like manner be withheld from the interest or coupons accrued on such bonds at the time of the payment thereof. The tax hereby provided for shall be withheld from the interest or coupons becoming due on and after the 1st day of November, 1868.

Mr. UPSON. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. UPSON. My point of order is that the Committee of the Whole has passed the part of the bill relating to the subject of this amendment, and therefore this amendment is not germane to the part of the bill we are now considering. Besides that, we have once voted down this very amendment, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN. This amendment is offered as an independent section, and is in order unless the language be the same as that of the amendment of the gentleman just voted down.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not the same; it is different in several respects.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have a suggestion to make to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] This whole subject of the taxation of bonds has been referred, in various ways and forms, to the Committee of Ways and Means; and it is proposed by the committee to consider that subject. If the committee shall decide to propose an amendment upon this subject it will be moved hereafter; and if the committee do not offer any such amendment the gentleman shall have ample opportunity to offer his amendment. I therefore suggest that he withdraw his amendment at this time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will agree to the suggestion of the gentleman, and withdraw my amendment at this time.

No further amendment was offered.

The next section was read, as follows:

Passports.

SEC. 117. And be it further enacted, That for every passport issued from the office of the Secretary of State there shall be paid the sum of five dollars, which amount may be paid to any collector of internal revenue, and his receipt therefor shall be forwarded with the application for such passport to the office of the Secretary of State, or any agent appointed by him, to be transmitted to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to be charged to the account of such collector; and a like amount shall be paid for every passport issued by any minister or consul of the United States, who shall report the same to the Secretary of State, and account therefor to the Treasury. And all payments for passports shall be accounted for as internal tax.

No amendment was offered.

The next section was read, as follows:

Insurance Companies.

SEC. 118. And be it further enacted, That there shall be levied, collected, and paid, a tax of one and a half per cent. on the gross receipts of premiums or assessments for insurance from loss or damage by fire or by the perils of the sea, whether inland or marine, or against injury or accident to persons while traveling by land or water, made by an insurance company, or by any association or individual engaged in the business of insurance; and a tax of three per cent. on the like gross receipts of the agency of any foreign insurance company having an office or doing business within the United States, to be paid by the agent of said company; and in the return to be rendered the amount insured, renewed, or continued, the gross amount of premiums received, or assessments collected, and the taxes by law accruing thereon, shall be specifically stated.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move to amend this section by inserting after the words "gross receipts," where they first occur, the words "in money," so that this tax shall not be levied on the premium notes received by these companies. That portion of the section, if so amended, will read:

That there shall be levied, collected, and paid, a tax of one and a half per cent. on the gross receipts in money of premiums or assessments for insurance from loss or damage by fire or the perils of the sea, whether inland or marine, or against injury or accident to persons while traveling by land or water, made by any insurance company, or by any association or individual engaged in the business of insurance.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JUDD. I move to amend the first portion of this section by striking out the words "one and a half" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "one half of one."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. JUDD. I move to amend this section, by striking out the words "gross receipts" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "net profits." I desire to say that the effect of this section as it now stands is to levy a tax upon the losses of insurance companies and not upon their profits alone. The tax upon the gross receipts, as provided by this section as it now stands, is not a tax solely upon the profits made by these companies, but also upon the losses sustained by these companies. The experience of insurance companies for the last two years, I think, shows the propriety of the amendment I have offered. It seems to me that it is for the public interest and for the general public welfare that insurance companies should be encouraged. The action of the people shows that, and our legislation ought not to restrict it. But, as I have already said, the operation of this section as reported, is to compel these companies to pay taxes on their losses as well as on their profits.

Mr. HALSEY. The net profits of these companies are already taxed in another portion of this bill, which provides for a tax on dividends and surplus.

Mr. JUDD. I will let the vote be taken upon my amendment.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. JUDD; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I move to amend this section by striking out the words "and a tax of three per cent. on the like gross receipts of the agency of any foreign insurance company having an office or doing business within the United States, to be paid by the agent of said company." It seems to me the policy of this country should be to encourage the very thing which this discrimination discourages. It is for the interest of all to bring down the rates of insurance in this country as low as possible. For one, I cannot see any possible reason for discriminating in so important a matter against the introduction of foreign capital for the benefit of the people of this country.

Mr. PAINE. It seems to me that the argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRISWOLD] would be good against protecting any other American interest from foreign competition. I think there is adequate capital in the United States to meet all the demands of insurance companies in the country. This provision, for the protection of American insurance companies against foreign insurance companies, is neither unwise nor unjust, when you consider the interests of the entire American people, unless you say that the protection of any American interest against foreign competition is unjust to the entire American people, because it brings down the price of such articles.

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee of Ways and Means inserted this provision, not so much to discriminate against foreign insurance companies, as from the fact that all our American insurance companies are compelled not only to pay a tax on their gross receipts, but they are compelled to pay other taxes in various forms, while the only tax received from foreign insurance companies is upon their gross receipts. They make no dividends in this country, and are not subject, therefore, to the burdens to which home insurance companies are subjected.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. PETERS. I move to insert the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That there shall be levied, collected, and paid a tax of two per cent. on the gross receipts of safe deposit companies, or companies known by any other name, or of individuals, who charge and receive compensation for the safe-keeping of money, plate, goods, books, papers, or other personal property of any description.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am in favor of that amendment, and shall vote for it; but I cannot speak for the other members of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. ALLISON. How much is the tax proposed?

Mr. PETERS. Two per cent.

Mr. ALLISON. I think that is too high a tax. Of course it will come out of persons who make these deposits of valuables for safe-keeping. I would have no objection to the amendment if the gentleman will make it one per cent.

Mr. PETERS. There is one fact I wish to recall to the attention of gentlemen. The Comptroller of the Currency has inhibited all national banks from receiving special deposits. That has led to a large business on the part of these safe-deposit institutions, and I understand that they are reaping great profits from it.

Mr. O'NEILL. One word. These institutions have deposits alone of gold and silver plate, jewelry, and valuable papers. They do not have money on deposit with a view to using that money and making profits. These safe-deposit companies are in their infancy, and their charges are now quite heavy. They are useful, and I think ought to be encouraged.

Mr. PETERS. I understand that it is a most profitable business, and this is a class of persons which ought to be compelled to pay taxes. They are for the rich.

Mr. O'NEILL. The gentleman is mistaken. On the contrary they are used by the poorer classes who cannot afford to have safes and iron chests.

Mr. PETERS. I do not see the force of the gentleman's distinction.

Mr. PILE. I desire to say that this class of companies makes most exorbitant charges, and that they realize better profits than any other class. I think they ought to be taxed two per cent.

Mr. PETERS. Are the Committee of Ways and Means in favor of a less tax than two per cent?

Mr. SCHENCK. Railroad companies are charged two and a half, insurance companies four and a half, and if we are going to tax these safe-deposit companies I do not think that one and a half or two per cent. is too much.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. I move, in the sixth line of the one hundred and eighteenth section, after the word "marine" to insert "or on life or lives." Mr. Chairman, the object of that amendment is to make life insurance companies pay the same amount of tax as fire, marine, and accident insurance companies.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I will state that was omitted after consideration by the Committee of Ways and Means, on the ground that it was desirable to encourage in every way the business of life insurance, for it enables a man with limited means to make provision for his family.

Mr. STEWART. I am aware of the argument that is made in favor of this exception, but the same argument can be used for fire, marine, and accident insurance companies. I do not see any reason for discrimination. There is no life insurance company that does not pay large dividends and have large surpluses on hand. I think it is due not only to these other companies, but to the people of the country, that this should not be an exception. So far as humanity is concerned the argument will apply as well to fire, marine, and accident insurance companies as to life insurance companies. It is as good an argument in one case as in the other.

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next section, as follows:

Transportation Companies.

SEC. 119. And be it further enacted, That there shall be levied, collected, and paid a tax of two and one half per cent. on the gross receipts for the transportation of passengers of every railroad, canal, steamboat, ship, barge, canal-boat, or other vessel, and stage coach or other vehicle, except hacks or carriages not running on continuous routes, engaged or employed in the business of transporting passengers for hire; and on the gross receipts of every toll-road, ferry, and bridge, authorized by law to receive toll for the transit of passengers, vehicles, and freight of any description, over such toll-road, ferry, or bridge. The tax hereby imposed shall not be assessed upon receipts for the transportation of passengers between the United States and any foreign country, but shall be assessed upon the receipts for such transportation from a place within the United States through a foreign territory to another place within the United States, and shall be assessed upon and collected from persons, firms, companies, or corporations within the United States, receiving hire or pay for such transportation of passengers: Provided, That no tax under the provisions of this section shall be assessed upon any person, firm, company, or corporation, whose gross receipts do not exceed $2,000 per annum; and that when the gross receipts of any bridge or toll-road shall not exceed the amount necessarily expended during any term of twelve consecutive months to keep such bridge or toll-road in repair, no tax shall be assessed upon the receipts during the six months next preceding: And provided further, That all boats, barges, and flats, not used for carrying passengers, nor propelled by steam or sails, which are floated or towed by tug-boats or horses, and used exclusively for carrying coal, oil, minerals, or agricultural products to market, shall be required hereafter, in lieu of enrollment fees or tonnage tax, to pay as an annual tax, for each and every such boat, of a capacity exceeding twenty-five tons and not exceeding one hundred tons, five dollars; and when exceeding one hundred tons, as aforesaid, shall pay ten dollars; and said tax shall be assessed and collected as other annual taxes provided for in this act.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to strike out the word "preceding" and insert "succeeding." The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move further to amend by striking out the words "and used exclusively for carrying coal, oil, minerals, or agricultural products to market."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CORNELL. I move to amend by inserting in line five, after the word "passengers," the word "only."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CORNELL. I move further to insert after the word "hire," in line eight, the words "and in lieu of all tonnage tax on steamboats or other vessels for carrying passengers." At present, besides the two and a half per cent., there is a tonnage tax imposed upon steamboats, while railroads only pay two and a half per cent. on passenger receipts. This seems to me unequal and unfair. I have in my hand the tonnage tax of one steamboat. It pays for tonnage tax, $870; for boiler and inspection, $165; for hospital fees, fifty-seven dollars; for license stamps, two dollars; while a railroad conducting the same kind of business pays simply two and a half per cent. I believe the tonnage tax which is imposed upon carrying passengers should be stricken out.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know that I want to oppose the amendment. This tonnage tax and the other taxes have always, I believe, been imposed. I do not like to accept the amendment.

Mr. PIKE. Allow me to suggest that this tonnage tax now applies to foreign as well as American steamers. There is a bill now pending in the House, reported the other day from the Committee on Commerce, and is to be taken up immediately after the passage of this bill, regulating this very matter of the tonnage tax. I think it will accomplish the object of my friend from New York [Mr. CORNELL] much better than this amendment. The operation of this would be to take the tax off all the foreign steamers. There are steamers running into the port of New York almost every day in the year, and this would abolish the tonnage tax altogether.

Mr. CORNELL. Not at all. It applies to river and sound steamers, and not to foreign vessels at all.

Mr. PIKE. I hope this will be remitted to the bill I have alluded to, which has a section devoted to the tonnage tax.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. TWICHELL. I move to strike out the words "and a half," in line three; so that it will read, "on the gross receipts of railroads," &c., "two per cent." I trust there will be no objection to this from any member of the committee.

A MEMBER. What is the law now?

Mr. TWICHELL. It is two and a half. It is certainly a discrimination against railroads. I do not propose to discuss the question of the reasonableness of my proposition. I am sure it will commend itself to the members of the committee. There is no reason why it should be as high as two and a half per cent. on the gross receipts.

Mr. SPALDING. I think this is right. There is no allowance for expenses.

Mr. SCHENCK. The present charge is two and a half per cent.; we have not increased it.

Mr. SPALDING. That is too high.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am willing to submit to the House whether the tax ought to be reduced.

Mr. TWICHELL. It has been said that the railroads have all increased their fares. The road that I represent has not increased the fare during the war or since.

Mr. HOPKINS. I am very glad to hear that there is one road that has not put up its fare.

Mr. BENTON. I move to strike out "two and a half" and insert "three." The railroads are raising their fares all over the country.

A MEMBER. It will only come back on the people.

Mr. BENTON. It is notorious that there is no more profitable business in the country than this. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SPALDING. Very many of these companies, I know, after charging their expenses have nothing left with which to pay this two and a half per cent. on their gross receipts. No allowance is made for drawbacks of this sort, and they all complain that the tax is too high. I believe it has been so, and I think the reduction from two and a half to two per cent. is a reasonable one. I believe it would be satisfactory all around.

Mr. BENTON. Let me say, in answer to what the gentleman says, that if we can rely upon the information that we receive through the public press, where the Government has imposed the tax, it has been doubled and trebled by the companies and taken out of their customers, and they virtually have not paid one single cent of the tax. They have doubled and trebled and quadrupled the amount of the tax and charged it to their customers.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. And does the gentleman propose to increase it still further for them to make the people pay an additional amount?

Mr. BENTON. No; I do not propose to give them any such chance. I propose to tax them and limit them in the increase of their rates.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. In many of the States they are already limited by law in their rates of fare.

Mr. BENTON. It has been asserted over and over again by the New York press, and I have never seen it contradicted, that where a tax of one per cent. has been imposed upon them they have imposed five and ten per cent. on their customers.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I desire to say a word or two upon this subject. There is no tax on this whole list, it seems to me, which is so onerous as this. You tax the entire gross receipts, and the record shows that half the companies in the country are to-day, after paying their expenses, receiving little or nothing for their investment. More than that, if gentlemen will look at it a little further, they will see that this applies to boats of every character on the lakes and rivers and on the sound. Take the large companies running on Long Island sound between New York and Boston and the intermediate places, and these companies with one single exception have been unable to make a living out of it. One of those companies collects perhaps five hundred thousand or a million dollars during the year and they are assessed on the entire amount, and with a single exception those large companies have made failures. The same thing is true to a great extent of the companies running on the rivers and lakes. Why? Because, after paying this extraordinary assessment, they have nothing to divide. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts will be agreed to. This tax is not only exceedingly burdensome to the railroad companies, but is exceedingly burdensome to the steamboat interest on our lakes, rivers, and sounds.

Mr. BENTON. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question recurred on Mr. TWICHELL's amendment, and there were—ayes 49, noes 35; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. TWICHELL and FARNSWORTH were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 45.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COBURN. I offer the following amendment:

Page 175, line twenty-eight, after the word "preceding" insert the words "and that when the gross receipts of any street railroad company in cities and towns of less than seventy-five thousand inhabitants shall not exceed the gross expenses during any term of twelve consecutive months, no tax shall be assessed upon the receipts during the six months next succeeding."

The effect of that amendment is to put street railroads in towns of less than seventy-five thousand inhabitants upon a par with bridges and toll-roads. Such street railroads are kept in repair and run very frequently in small cities in the interest of the public rather than of individuals. The amount that the Government would lose by reason of the taking off of the tax, if the tax were taken off where the railroads do not pay, would be very small. There are not in the Union perhaps more than twenty-five cities to which this amendment would apply.

In the State of New York there are some thirty-six street railroads, and there are not five of those thirty-six that do not pay expenses. In the State of Pennsylvania, out of some twenty-six, there are only four that do not pay. And in the State of Massachusetts where there are twenty, there are but three street railroads that do not pay.

These railroads of which I speak are not all in places of less than seventy-five thousand inhabitants. In such places as Salem, Massachusetts; Troy, New York; Wheeling, West Virginia; Harrisburg, Pennsylvania; Indianapolis, Indiana; Nashville, Tennessee; and other places, street railroads are not paying institutions. I think it would be a very great hardship if those companies are made to pay a tax of two and a half per cent. upon their gross receipts, in addition to their original outlay, and the expenses to which they are continually liable.

I think it is but right that these street railroads should be put upon an equality with toll-roads and toll-bridges. The investment that has been made in a street railroad cannot be changed, should it prove to be unprofitable. Having once been built and equipped, it must be continued in operation, or the entire amount invested will be lost. As I said before, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the deduction from the revenue will be but little should my amendment be adopted, as it applies to those railroads only where the expenses exceed the receipts.

Mr. PILE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "in cities and towns of less than seventy-five thousand inhabitants." If I can get the attention of the committee for a moment I think I can convince them that this exception, if made at all, should be made generally. The same facts and the same remarks stated by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] with regard to street railroads in small cities and towns apply to large cities. I know, as a matter of fact, that in my city not a single street railroad company has paid one cent of dividend within the last three years. The companies have multiplied their roads and increased the number of their cars for the accommodation of the public, until, as I am informed by persons having an interest in those roads, the gross receipts in most cases do not equal the expenditures, and in no case do they exceed the expenditures by a sufficient amount to enable the company to pay a dividend upon the stock of the road. And there is this additional reason for the extension of this exception to railroads in large cities that does not apply to railroads in the smaller cities. In the larger cities there are a great many poor people whose friends the street railroads are; persons who live remote from their places of labor; common laborers, who are dependent upon these roads for their means of transit to and from the place of their daily toil. These railroads in the large cities are kept up largely for the accommodation of the public. And thus far in my city, I know, these railroads have paid little or no profits to their owners or proprietors. There are not those extremes of poverty in the smaller cities and towns as a general thing, that there are in the larger cities. There are not in the smaller towns such large numbers of persons who are less able to pay their fare upon these roads.

If any class of railroads are to be excepted from this tax because they are an accommodation to the poor and to the common people, and because their gross receipts do not exceed their gross expenditures, I think the exception should apply to all roads where that fact obtains, and not be confined simply to the roads in towns and cities of less than seventy-five thousand inhabitants. I hope, if this amendment is to prevail at all, if we are to except any street railroads from this tax, if we are to put these railroads upon the same footing with bridge companies and toll-roads, that we shall extend the exemption to all of these street railroads alike.

Mr. BENTON. This is not the first occasion, Mr. Chairman, when, in view of being subjected to taxation, individuals have suddenly become very poor, receiving no profits from their investments. Now, I do not believe any such thing, as has been asserted, that as a general rule these horse railroads, as they are termed, do not yield any profits. Undoubtedly there are exceptions to the general rule. But as a general thing you find men organizing themselves into companies and asking for corporate privileges for the very purpose of establishing these roads in all our cities and large towns.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to ask my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. BENTON] whether there is any horse railroad in the town in which he resides.

Mr. BENTON. No, sir; I am glad to say there is not. I think that these horse railroads, instead of being, as claimed, the friend of all who happen to patronize them, are in many cases their worst enemies.

Mr. PILE. On what ground?

Mr. BENTON. On the ground that frequently individuals, instead of walking as they might do, crawl into the horse cars to ride twenty, thirty, and forty rods. It has become so fashionable to ride in the cars that everybody must ride whether there is any necessity for it or not.

Mr. PILE. I am very certain that the poor people of our cities do not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I would like the gentleman from New Hampshire to give me, if he is able, the names of three horse railroads that have paid dividends within the last two years.

Mr. BENTON. The gentleman asks me a question with regard to the business of these companies, in reference to which he must know I am not particularly informed.

Mr. GRISWOLD. The gentleman was giving facts, and I supposed he was conversant with the subject. I asked for information.

Mr. BENTON. I can mention the Pennsylvania avenue railroad in this city, and the railroads in the city of New York.

Mr. GRISWOLD. The gentleman is entirely wrong there.

Mr. BENTON. Unless the facts are much misrepresented the railroads in the city of New York are not only making money, but, being taxed one eighth of a cent on their fares, they imposed an additional charge of one cent on their customers, thus taking the tax, increased sevenfold, out of the pockets of the people. I also understand that in the city of Boston enormous profits have been made by these horse railroad companies, much larger profits than those of the regular railroads. If these roads are not profitable, I ask again, why is it that in our large towns you find men rushing to invest their capital in this business and establish new lines?

Mr. MAYNARD. Does not the gentleman know that we have been told here on the very best authority that the banks are in a languishing condition?

Mr. BENTON. I know that.

Mr. MAYNARD. And the patent medicine business has been represented to be in a languishing condition.

Mr. BENTON. Certainly.

Mr. MAYNARD. And the case has been the same with almost every other interest that has thus far come up for consideration. Does the gentleman expect the railroads to be in any more flourishing condition than these other interests?

Mr. BENTON. Not until after these taxes are settled upon. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I suppose the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] considers a bank to be in a "languishing condition" when it pays a semi-annual dividend of only twenty per cent. [Laughter.]

Mr. LYNCH. Does not the gentleman from New Hampshire also know that the hotels at the White mountains are in a languishing condition? [Laughter.]

Mr. BENTON. Not by any means. They are, I am happy to inform the gentleman, in a very flourishing condition.

The question being taken on Mr. PILE's amendment to the amendment, there were—ayes 37, noes 35; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. PILE and BENTON.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 50, noes 47.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. COBURN's amendment as amended.

Mr. ELA. I move to amend the amendment by adding:

Provided, That all railroads, steamboats, transportation companies or individuals who do a losing business shall be relieved from all internal revenue taxes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must reduce his amendment to writing, and send it to the Clerk's desk, before it can be entertained.

The question being taken on Mr. COBURN's amendment as amended, there were—ayes 37, noes 38; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. ALLISON and Judd.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes fifty, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. I move to amend the section by striking out, in the twenty-third line, the word "two" and inserting "six;" so as to make the clause read:

Provided, That no tax under the provisions of this section shall be assessed upon any person, firm, company, or corporation whose gross receipts do not exceed $6,000 per annum, &c.

Mr. Chairman, the object of the committee seems to be to protect the smaller class of roads, turnpike companies, &c., and while we recognize this principle it seems to me but fair and just that we should extend this exemption at least to companies whose gross receipts do not exceed $6,000. If there are any roads in which every section of the country is interested it is these little turnpikes that barely pay expenses. Where they collect from two to four thousand dollars, under the section as it stands, we tax the entire sum. In many parts of the country these turnpike companies are in a languishing condition, and have paid nothing to the stockholders. In my own State I do not believe there is a turnpike company that pays a single cent. Every one in the country is interested in keeping up these turnpike companies, and in having others built where the interests of the country demand them. I think, therefore, that a tax upon these roads is really a tax upon the people. I hope the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will consent to this exemption of $6,000 instead of $2,000. The entire country is interested in it. There is no one who invests in turnpike companies who expects to make anything out of them. This tax of two and two and one half per cent. deprives them of all hope of making anything out of their investments. My amendment will also relieve the little street railroads whose incomes do not amount to the amount I have fixed. It will also relieve small ferries, which the people of the country are interested in keeping up. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether it is likely to meet with success that any one should endeavor to oppose the railroad interest in this House. I am rapidly coming to the conclusion at which my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] has arrived, that every interest of the country, and especially of corporations, must be in a languishing and sinking condition. The moment you touch one of them you hear nothing but embarrassments, losses, and the impossibility of making profits. We have heretofore heard from our friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] of "the poor man's light," and from my friend from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] of "the poor man's lumber." The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNES] told us about "the poor man's medicines," which, in my judgment, are composed of two ingredients, half poison and half profit. [Laughter.] In their sympathetic souls they have no other desire than to help the poor man. No one thinks or seems to have any idea that the stockholders are men who desire to make money at all, or that they are at all concerned in being relieved from this tax. Let us see whether this sympathetic feeling is entirely for the poor man. Let us try these street railroads. With great ingenuity they succeeded a few years ago, and with greater ingenuity they succeeded in getting upon the statute-book a provision—

Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire. Is the subject of street railroads now in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. SCHENCK. These street railroads managed to get upon the statute-book a provision, when they were charged two and a half per cent., which on their fare is one eighth of one cent, to charge an additional cent upon their fare against the people, and thus get seven eighths upon every passenger by reason of paying taxes; that is, they make money out of taxation. Now, sir, not satisfied with making money out of the tax, they wish to begin at the other end of the string, and take the tax off altogether.

Mr. PILE. I wish to say that so far as the street railroads of St. Louis are concerned they have not added on an additional cent. Five cents is the standing fare upon every street railroad in the city of St. Louis.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hold in my hand a perfect wail from these street railroads. It is from two excellent gentlemen whom I know. They show by statistics in what a ruinous condition the street railroads are. None of them had made dividends or could make dividends in New York. When asked abruptly what the stock was selling for, they admitted it stood at 150 or 160, or at some high premium. They said that was the result of dealings in real estate which we had no right to take notice of. Well, that may be so; I dare say it is; but my impression is that when the organized aggregations of capital can be used so that the stock which represents that capital in the hands of the holders is kept above par, so as to make it a good investment, they are not suffering to the extent to which they claim. And yet now that we come upon this subject of railroads I find we have waked up a very large feeling of sympathy—to call it by no stronger name—in this House, and that we can hardly do too much for these railroads. We were thought to be acting fairly toward them when we did not propose to increase their tax at all, while in regard to many other taxes there has been a process of equalization and increase. Yet these large corporations—I speak of railroads generally,—which now pay two and a half per cent., if the amendment made to-day becomes a part of the law will pay only two per cent. And I believe one gentleman thought if he could only get the floor he could bring it down to one per cent., such deep sympathy was there in this House for these suffering railroads. All I desire to say is, that while we do not ask to put a heavier burden on them at all than they have had heretofore, we shall hesitate for some time about coming to the belief that these corporations have suffered or are suffering so that we cannot at least keep up in some degree the present contributions which we require of them for the purpose of sustaining the Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JUDD. I move, as an additional amendment, to strike out "six" and insert "five." I have listened with a great deal of interest to the lecture of the honorable chairman of the committee, [Mr. SCHENCK.] It is generally pleasant to the House, and perhaps it is very well advised; but it seems to me that he is urging now upon this committee a principle which has not a basis of reason. The principle upon which all taxation is based, and upon which this bill is based, is that property should pay it, and that the revenues derived from property should bear their proportion for the support of the government. I do not believe the chairman of the committee would say that he intended by this bill, or any portion of it, to tax a man who is losing money, or to tax a man upon property that does not return him any sort of income, but the theory of taxation is that you take it from the man that earns more than his daily bread; you take from his excess and give it to the support of the Government. Now, sir, there is no reason why, when honorable members on this floor assert as within their personal knowledge that a certain branch of industry which is absolutely necessary to the existence of the people in a certain portion of the country is a losing business, that the stockholders derive nothing from it, and that it is kept in existence for the benefit of the masses of the people, any one should turn round and say that those gentlemen are advocating a special interest in this country.

Mr. BENTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask if it is not very easy under the proposed amendment so to expend their income as to have none left over improvements and repairs?

Mr. JUDD. Allow me to ask the gentleman what is the population of his town?

Mr. BENTON. About five hundred voters.

Mr. JUDD. In answer to the gentleman I will say that it is possible for any corporation to waste or absorb all its earnings in improvements, if you please; to put them in some form that they shall represent other than profits; but I tell you, when they undertake to expend all their money, their income account shows perfectly well whether they make profits or not. And there is no device by which they can increase their capital or otherwise which the tax-gatherer will not be able to reach. Sir, I have seen cars in my State loaded down with workmen who could not live within the thickly-inhabited portion of the city, coming to their daily labor. I know some of these roads that have been carrying these passengers during the last two years for less than cost. I tell the gentleman from New Hampshire if he will go to any of the large cities where these railroads are in use he will find it is not the company—although they may have entered upon the enterprise for profit—but the people that are benefited.

Mr. BENTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JUDD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BENTON. I would like to know at what kind of business those laborers can earn as much money as they could save by walking instead of paying car fare?

Mr. JUDD. I say that the laborer who commences his work at seven o'clock in the morning, being compelled to get his breakfast first, and who would have to walk six miles to his place of work, needs this method of transportation. And after his day's labor is ended, when he has toiled eight or ten hours as hard as he can for the support of his family, my friend from New Hampshire would have him, before he takes his frugal evening meal, repeat that walk of six miles. I tell you this is a tax which we do not propose to impose on the laboring men of our region.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ALLISON. I oppose the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. JUDD. I withdraw it.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate on this section.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Before that is done I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. Amendments will still be in order.

Mr. INGERSOLL. But I want to debate it. The question was taken on Mr. ALLISON's motion; and the committee refused to rise.

Mr. KOONTZ. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "six" and inserting "seven." There are many persons throughout the country engaged in carrying passengers who are contractors upon small post routes. They engage in the business, not so much because it is remunerative, but in order to accommodate the wants of the public. It is well known that these mail contracts are awarded to the lowest bidders, and I think it unfair to those parties who have taken the contracts at the lowest price, and who are compelled by public necessity to carry passengers, that they should be taxed. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question recurred on the amendment proposed by Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire, with a view of testing the principle involved in this section, to move to strike out "two and one half" in line three, and insert "seven;" and in line four to strike out "gross" and insert the word "net" in lieu thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is not in order until the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TRIMBLE] shall have been disposed of.

The question was taken on Mr. TRIMBLE's amendment, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. HIGBY. I move to amend the section by striking out in lines six and seven the words "and stage coach or other vehicle, except hacks or carriages not running on continuous routes." Mr. Chairman, I venture the assertion that there is no State in the Union that pays so much tax upon vehicles of this kind as the State of California; and I venture the assertion that with the exception of the other States on the Pacific slope and the Territories, there is no portion of the Union where the expense of travel is so great as it is there, not because they charge extravagant prices, but because our methods of conveyance are far more expensive than they are here in the East. Now, with this tax added on—I do not mean to say that that is the only cause, but with this tax added on the burden has become so great that in many instances it has broken up our stage routes, and the means of travel from point to point have been taken away from the people. I will give an instance of the difference of expense in different modes of travel. In going from Sacramento to my own town, I pay for the first forty miles in the cars $2 50; and then for the thirty miles in the stage I pay $4 50. I go the forty miles in two hours, and it takes seven hours to go the thirty miles. This illustrates the difference between railroad travel and travel by stage in the larger portion of the country.

A gentleman near me says, "Go afoot." I have heard of walking lines of stages, but I am not in the habit of walking so far. Sir, the more money we have to pay for traveling on these stage-coach lines in California per hundred miles the more tax we have to pay, for of course the passengers have to pay this tax. It has been said here by gentlemen that street railroads do not pay, and yet they have to pay this tax. They continue to pay it possibly because they are not so easily broken up and the amount invested in them cannot so conveniently be put in other business. But a stage route can be very easily broken up.

A friend near me [Mr. STARKWEATHER] calls my attention to the fact that of the tax derived from this source last year California alone paid the sum of $45,569 64. That tax is paid upon routes where it costs four and five times the amount to travel a hundred miles that it does on any railroad in the eastern States, and those routes pay four and five times the tax that is paid for the same distance and amount of travel in the East. It makes an extremely grievous burden upon the people of a State who can travel in no other way than upon those stages. An effort was made in the Thirty-Ninth Congress to keep this tax out of the law, and some of the members of the Committee of Ways and Means were in favor of omitting it. But a majority of the committee held that it should be retained; and it was put in. I think this is one of the burdens from which the people should be relieved. I am not speaking in behalf of the owners and capitalists interested in stage lines, but of the mass of the people who are compelled to travel in this way and can travel in no other; and because the expense of traveling in my State is so extremely high in comparison with the expense of traveling in the East.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is very natural, I suppose, that we should all look at this subject from the point of view in which it necessarily presents itself in the State or locality we represent. The gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] objects to taxing these lines of stage-coaches, and moves to strike out the provision imposing the tax, so as to put them upon a different footing, as it were, from that occupied by lines of railroads. And what is the reason he assigns for his opposition? That this tax operates unequally upon different parts of the country.

The whole amount of revenue received last year from the tax on the gross receipts of stage-coaches, carriages, and vehicles upon continuous routes, was about two hundred and forty-one thousand dollars. The gentleman says that he finds that of that amount $45,000 was collected in California alone. Why is that? Because in California they are running stage-coaches, while in other parts of the country they are running railroads.

I suppose the tax on bullion in California is many times the amount of tax upon bullion in Indiana, because they dig it in the one place and do not in the other. The tax is collected where the article is found. And the fact that this mode of conveyance is taxed more in one part of the country than another is compensated by the fact that in other parts of the country other taxes are more while in this part of the country they are less. In other words, there is no inequality in the matter, because you tax the mode of conveyance, no matter where it may be found. And in one part of the country you tax one investment of capital, and in another part of the country you tax another investment. It does not follow that California is hardly treated because she pays one fifth of all the tax raised in the United States upon stage-coaches. Other States might respond that they had paid taxes upon railroads very largely beyond their proportion in extent of territory and amount of population. There is a fallacy in the statement and argument the gentleman has made upon the inequality there is in the matter of this taxation.

Now, sir, the Committee of Ways and Means in this matter have not gone beyond the present law. They have reported in this bill the same provision upon this subject that there is in the present law. We have been unable to see why capital invested and employed in one kind of business should be freed from taxation any more than capital invested and employed in another kind of business. One thing, is certain, those who invest their capital in any business do so with a view to the profits they expect to derive upon it. If one kind of business becomes unprofitable, through competition or any other cause, they shift their investment into something else; and thus the whole thing naturally finds something like a level.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means be kind enough to state, as I believe he has the returns before him, how much revenue has been derived from this tax on railroads, steamboats, &c., during the past year?

Mr. SCHENCK. The gross revenue collected under this provision from railroads has been, in round numbers, $4,128,000; on ships, barges, &c., $4,876; on stage-coaches, &c., $241,297; and on steamboats, $91,805, making an aggregate of between five and six million dollars.

The amendment of Mr. HIGBY was not agreed to; there being—ayes five, noes not counted.

Mr. DRIGGS. I move to amend by adding at the end of this section the following:

Provided, That no tax shall be assessed upon the gross receipts of any steamboat or ferry-boat, where the same have not amounted to the actual expense incident to running the same for the six months preceding, upon the production of satisfactory proof to the assessor of such fact.

Mr. Chairman, I would not have proposed this amendment but that I have felt it to be my duty to do so. I am satisfied that no tax should be levied on the proceeds of any business or enterprise when those receipts do not equal the actual expenses. I think, sir, that the cases contemplated by my amendment are peculiar, and perhaps different from any others which have been presented to the attention of the committee. In some of the newer sections of the country, it frequently happens that little steamers are started to run to and from places where small communities have been built up; and this means of communication is a matter of absolute necessity in order to accommodate the people of those settlements. In my own district, a gentleman during the last year ran two boats in that way, which were supported to a great extent by the citizens, who paid double fare in order to keep them running, and to make the receipts somewhere near the expenses. That gentleman was assessed of course upon the gross receipts of those boats. Now, it seems to me that there is a great hardship in imposing such taxation. In many cases these steamers and ferry-boats ply but a few miles. They have been charged, in some instances, custom-house fees on departing and arriving. In regard to some boats of this character in which my own constituents were interested, I procured a remission of those charges. I believe that such enterprises should be relieved also from this tax on the gross receipts. I think such exemption is equally just with the provision exempting toll-roads and toll-bridges. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. ALLISON. I oppose the amendment, and ask for a vote.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to amend the pending section by striking out the word "two" before the words "per cent.," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "seven;" and also by striking out "gross" before the word "receipts," and inserting "net;" so that the section will read:

That there shall be levied, collected, and paid, a tax of seven per cent. on the net receipts for the transportation of passengers of every railroad, canal, &c.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know that this amendment will meet the concurrence of a majority of the committee; but, whether it shall be adopted or not, I want to enter my protest against the principle involved in this section.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. What does my colleague mean by "net receipts?"

Mr. INGERSOLL. Receipts over and above the expenses of operating the road, canal, or whatever it may be.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Then you mean profits?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Why not say "net profits?"

Mr. INGERSOLL. There may be a distinction between receipts and profits; because out of the net receipts or earnings of the road, a company might have to pay interest on its bonded or funded debt; but still those net earnings would be profit on the running of the road for the particular year. What I design to accomplish by this amendment is that no railroad company or similar corporation shall be obliged to pay taxation on gross receipts, but only on the surplus after the expenses of conducting the business have been paid. Whether the committee shall agree with me or not, I for one want to enter my protest against the whole principle of assessing a tax on gross receipts. There is no justice, no equity in such a principle. Take, for instance, the railroads in the State of New York. The New York Central railroad earns annually $14,000,000 of gross receipts, while its net receipts amount to $4,000,000; that is the amount left after paying the expenses of operating the road. The Erie railroad earns, in round numbers, $14,000,000 of gross receipts, while its expenses are about ten million dollars, leaving $4,000,000 of net receipts. I think, sir, those roads paid about two hundred and eighty thousand dollars each per annum upon their gross earnings.

Mr. MAYNARD. My friend will pardon me. That was paid out of the gross earnings, and not out of the net earnings as he calls them.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Many of our roads, and the gentleman will see the distinction, pay on their gross receipts and have no balance left. They have to pay on the gross earnings of the road even if they sink money in the operation. That is the proposition here. And, sir, not one half of the railroads in the United States pay dividends to the stockholders. Take the roads in Minnesota and Wisconsin and elsewhere. There are roads now building in Illinois, extensions of roads in operation, which have never paid one farthing of dividend.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Is it not in the power of these railroad corporations to make these dividends as they please?

Mr. INGERSOLL. If they are rascals, then make laws to detect them.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Cannot they take them off in a thousand ways?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not want my time taken up with that question. Mr. Chairman, I object to taxing gross receipts. There are many new enterprises, such as the manufacture of sugar from beets, and so on, in which capital is invested, and if you tax the gross receipts, you tax them when in reality they, in the beginning of these new enterprises, may have suffered very heavy losses. You tax them when they have already borne losses in the hopes that in the end the enterprise will be a success. I do not undertake to break down the revenue from this source. I say that a railroad corporation is better able to pay seven per cent. on the net receipts than two per cent. on the gross receipts.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say one word in reply to the various amendments, and then to move that the committee rise to close debate on this section. It is perfectly certain, Mr. Chairman, that from some source we must raise revenue. This practice of raising revenue from gross receipts is in accord with almost every provision in this tax bill. We tax manufacturers so much on sales. Even if they have lost $10,000 each on their manufactures, still they must pay the tax. So with the wholesale merchants. If they lose, still they must pay the tax. During the last year we secured about six million dollars from this source, and there are other subjects which can be better relieved than this.

Mr. MAYNARD. If we pass this emasculated section, how much will it give?

Mr. ALLISON. We will gain nothing if these amendments are adopted.

Mr. HARDING. I ask the gentleman to inform me whether every dollar of this $6,000,000 does not come at last from the people upon whom these corporations, taking the burdens off their own shoulders, put them? Do not these companies collect this tax from the people? Does the gentleman understand me?

Mr. ALLISON. I do. I do not know that railroad and transportation companies do so. But, sir, in some States they cannot do it. Whatever is imposed upon the New York Central railroad is compelled to come out of the stockholders of that company. It is the same with some street railroads. They cannot charge it upon their fares.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Do you know any other railroad beside the New York Central where that is the case?

Mr. ALLISON. These railroads do charge it over. It is a heavy burden, I know, but I want gentlemen who ask that these companies may be released from taxation to provide some means by which taxes shall be obtained from some other source. If it is the object of gentlemen to repeal all taxes, then let us do it, and reverse this whole principle. But I say there is no tax more just than this upon transportation, especially when we have reduced it one per cent. Last year we took off all the tax on transportation or freight, because we thought it was a burden on the people. I hope the next year we can take off this entirely. I agree it is a burden, but it is one we must endure for the time being. Therefore I hope the several amendments interfering with the revenue to be received from this source will not be adopted.

Mr. HIGBY. I can tell the gentleman how to remedy it. By equalizing taxation—not by throwing off all taxes, but by equalizing them.

Mr. ALLISON. I am obliged to the gentleman for the suggestion. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield to me? I think if he will agree to strike out $2,000 and insert $4,000 it will relieve a great many of these little stage companies and turnpike companies.

Mr. ALLISON. I will agree to that. I believe it is a just and fair amendment. If the gentleman had not made it $6,000 I would have voted for it before.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. I make that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order now. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to strike out the word "receipts."

Mr. SCHENCK. Can the gentleman modify his own amendment and thus make another speech?

The CHAIRMAN. He cannot if it is objected to.

The question being put on the amendment of Mr. INGERSOLL, there were—ayes 7, noes 48; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. INGERSOLL, and TRIMBLE of Kentucky.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 24, noes 71.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair votes in the negative, making a quorum; and the amendment is disagreed to.

Mr. HIGBY. I move to amend by insert after the word "and," in line six, the words "one per cent. on the gross receipts for the transportation of passengers on;" so that it will read:

On the gross receipts for the transportation of passengers of every railroad, canal, steamboat, ship, barge, canal-boat, or other vessel, and one per cent. on the gross receipts for the transportation of passengers on stage coach or other vehicle, &c.

I have proposed this amendment in order to say something in answer to the chairman of the committee, because he did not—I will not say intentionally—but he did not represent the matter as it truly is. If the object is simply to tax capital when he is taxing income upon stage companies it goes a great deal further than our experience justifies. He is taxing the people who support these lines of coaches. They are the ones who will have to pay it, and who do pay it. Sir, we in California have to pay, I will not say extravagant prices, but much higher prices for traveling than is paid anywhere in this Union on stage coaches. I have nothing to say with reference to our railroads or steamboats. Although we are paying a large revenue to the Government by our thousands of passengers from San Francisco to New York every month, we pay the tax willingly. But when you come to our inland travel by stage coaches, I say to the House that the price we have to pay is marvelous; and when this tax is put on over and above it, and the people who travel have to pay it, it will be considered a terrible burden upon them. I think we shall find the same to be the case in the Territories, where they cannot travel by railroad, especially in the Territories west of the Rocky mountains.

Now, sir, the tax that rests on our shoulders in California amounts to over fifty thousand dollars, where we have only some two hundred miles of railroad, and yet on our stage coaches we pay between forty and fifty thousand dollars. That is borne by the mass of the people, those who have small means. They are obliged to travel, and there are no competing lines by which they can go. Upon our great thoroughfares, where there is competition, where there are different lines competing with one another, it is very different. But it is not so in that State and in the neighboring States. There are no competing lines, and they cannot be maintained. It is for that reason that I make this motion, and ask that the people shall be relieved from this burden; for it is not the companies who pay it, but the people.

The question was taken on Mr. HIGBY's amendment, and it was disagreed to—ayes twenty-six, noes not counted.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

At this point the committee rose informally, and the Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 322) granting a pension to Sherman H. Cowles;

A bill (S. No. 323) granting a pension to Michael Kelly;

A bill (S. No. 344) granting a pension to Caroline and Margaret Swartwout;

A bill (S. No. 420) granting a pension to James A. Guthrie;

A bill (S. No. 421) granting a pension to Caroline E. Thomas; and

A bill (S. No. 424) granting a pension to Bartlett and Carrie Edwards, children of David W. Edwards, deceased.

INTERNAL TAX BILL.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union then resumed its session.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent of the committee that all debate upon this section shall be closed. That will not prevent the offering of amendments.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. I move, on page 173, line twenty-three, to strike out "two" and insert "four" in lieu thereof; so that the proviso will read:

Provided, That no tax under the provisions of this section shall be assessed upon any person, firm, company, or corporation whose gross receipts do not exceed $4,000 per annum, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COBB. I offer the following amendment as a proviso, to come in at the end of the section:

Provided, That those railroad companies which have received grants of land from the Government of the United States shall pay four per cent. on their gross earnings.

The amendment was disagreed to—ayes ten, noes not counted.

The Clerk read the next section, as follows:

Express and Telegraph Companies.

SEC. 120. And be it further enacted, That there shall be levied, collected, and paid a tax of three per cent. on the gross amount of all receipts for carrying on or doing any express business within the United States, or between any place within the United States and any foreign country; and on the gross amount of all receipts for receiving or transmitting dispatches or messages by telegraph.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment:

Page 175, section one hundred and twenty, line three, strike out the word "three" and insert "two and one half" in lieu thereof; so that it will read:

That there shall be levied, collected, and paid a tax of two and one half per cent. on the gross amount of all receipts for carrying on or doing any express business within the United States, or between any place within the United States and any foreign country, &c.

The amendment was agreed to—ayes fifty-two, noes not counted.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer the following amendment from the Committee of Ways and Means, to come in immediately after the words just read:

And on the gross amount of all receipts for providing sleeping-cars or other special accommodations for passengers on railroads for which charges other than the fare for transportation are made,

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I propose, now that sleeping-cars are taxed, to add the words "and sleeping-cars" to the head line.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer the following amendment from the Committee of Ways and Means:

Page 175, at the end of line six, insert the words "three per cent.," so that it will read:

And three per cent. on the gross amount of all receipts for receiving or transmitting dispatches or messages by telegraph.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to inform the committee the reason for a distinction between express companies and telegraph companies.

Mr. SCHENCK. My colleague had better have asked the committee. The committee this morning, upon a revision of this section of the bill, agreed to bring the tax on express companies down to two and a half per cent. No proposition was made to bring down the tax on telegraph companies. By a vote of the committee the tax on express companies was brought down to two and a half per cent., and hence it is necessary to repeat this language. There were no action in the committee in reference to telegraph companies.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say this: that I happened to be out of the committee-room when the final vote was taken upon this question of the tax upon express companies. But I supposed the amendment applied equally to both parts of the section. I can see no reason for charging telegraph companies three per cent. and express companies only two per cent.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I understood that the motion was to strike out three per cent. and insert two and a half per cent. in both cases.

Mr. SCHENCK. Two of the members of the committee have said that they understood that this amendment was to apply both to express companies and telegraph companies. They will recollect, however, that not one word was said about anything but express companies.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. That may be so; but still I understood that the amendment applied to both.

Mr. SCHENCK. If it was so understood, of course the case is different from what I supposed.

Mr. MAYNARD. I know it is not exactly in order to refer to what took place in the committee-room. But I think I may be permitted to say that we had before us persons representing express companies, while there was no one there representing telegraph companies. That was the reason, perhaps, why nothing was said about telegraph companies.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well; by voting down this amendment the tax will be left at two and a half per cent. upon both telegraph and express companies.

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee of the Whole has reduced the tax on transportation companies from two and a half to two per cent. Under the present law express and telegraph companies are placed precisely upon the same footing. We have agreed to reduce the tax on express companies from three per cent., as reported, to two and a half per cent., for what reason I do not know, except that the proposed tax was too heavy.

Mr. CULLOM. The different companies pursue different kinds of business.

Mr. GRISWOLD. In justice to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. SCHENCK,] I desire to say that I was present this morning at the meeting of the Committee of Ways and Means, when we had under consideration the subject of decreasing the tax on express companies. I understood the matter exactly as the chairman says he understood it. Nothing at all was said about reducing the tax on telegraph companies, and I supposed the agreement was to leave that as it was reported in the bill.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. ALLISON to the amendment of Mr. SCHENCK; and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. SCHENCK, to make the tax on telegraph companies three per cent.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to amend the amendment so as to make the tax two per cent. I see no reason why telegraph companies should be taxed more than railroad companies.

Mr. SCHENCK. Because their profits are greater.

Mr. CULLOM. It is the most profitable business in the country.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It seems to me we might with just as much propriety tax people for the letters they receive. The telegraph interest is an interest which involves the whole people of the country. Everybody is interested in telegraphing, and in having it made as cheap as possible. Taxing it simply increases the cost of telegraphing.

Mr. CULLOM. And it is so with everything else.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. So it is. But why increase the tax on telegraph companies when you decrease the tax upon railroads and express companies? I am not aware that telegraph companies are any more prosperous than express companies. I do not know that express companies have more burdens imposed upon them than telegraph companies. It seems to me it is making an invidious distinction which should not be made. I have no interest in telegraph companies more than is held in common by other persons. I use them sometimes as others do. But everybody is interested in cheapening the cost of telegrams. It is proposed by some that the Government shall take charge of the telegraph lines of the country and make them a part of the postal system of the Government. Of course you would not tax telegraphing should that be done. If you determine to tax it, then you must let it remain where it now is, under the control of private enterprise. If you tax telegraph companies, you will simply add to the prices which will be charged for telegrams. If the chairman or any other member of the Committee of Ways and Means can give any reason why we should make a distinction in this respect between telegraph companies and express companies, I would like to hear it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I would inquire of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] if the telegraph line is the poor man's mail route?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It ought to be, but it never will be while you impose a tax of three per cent. upon it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will tell the gentleman why it is proposed to make the difference he speaks of. As the law is now each of these classes of companies is charged three per cent. upon its gross receipts. In this bill they are both embraced in one section. The express companies, through their representatives, have appeared before the Committee of Ways and Means, exhibited statistics, and made statements. After a revision of the whole subject, and taking into consideration the amount of capital employed, the amount of their losses and their profits, and their ability to bear a burden of this kind, the committee came to the conclusion that it was right and proper and just to put the tax upon express companies down to two and a half per cent. But nobody has undertaken to show to the committee that there was any reason for reducing the present tax upon the telegraph companies. The committee, from their knowledge on this subject, were inclined to believe that the tax ought to be left where it is. If the gentleman wants to know my own particular reasons for coming to that conclusion, I can tell him. The express companies cannot be started in opposition to each other without an enormous amount of outlay, while it costs comparatively little to build a few miles of telegraph. Thus competition springs up from time to time between different telegraph companies. Some fail in their struggles to secure a profitable existence while others succeed. But as a general rule the profits from telegraphs have been large in proportion to the cost of establishing them. They have, in general, paid well. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. COVODE] says that he has not found it so in his experience; but I know that in cases of which I have some personal knowledge the stock of telegraph companies has been extremely profitable. I am told that the Western Union Telegraph Company has not realized any considerable profits; but perhaps it has not been sufficiently long established. It must, however, be considered that one cannot tell from the returns of these companies whether they are or are not making profits. There are combinations made; there are processes called waterings of stock, expansions of stock, &c., by which companies, upon the statistical tables presented, may appear not to be making profits for their stockholders, when, in fact, the enterprise is yielding large returns for the investment. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COVODE.]

Mr. COVODE. Mr. Chairman, I desire that the tax on telegraph companies shall be put down to the same rate as that on express companies. I know it to be a fact that the express companies are making larger dividends than the telegraph companies. I happen to be familiar with this question. I have money invested in both classes of companies; and from the one I get dividends, while from the other I get none.

I have had $10,000 invested in telegraph company stock for a long time, and no dividends whatever have been declared. I do not see why we should impose less taxation on companies that declare dividends than on those that do not. It is unfair and unjust. I only ask that the tax on the telegraph companies shall be made the same as that on the express companies.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question being taken on Mr. FARNSWORTH's amendment to the amendment of Mr. SCHENCK, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes thirteen, noes not counted.

Mr. SCHENCK's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER. If that is done the bills must be taken up in their regular order and disposed of.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the motion will not prevail.

On the question of proceeding to business on the Speaker's table, there were—ayes 44, noes 28; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. INGERSOLL and HOLMAN.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If this motion prevails, will it be in order to set aside bills in order to reach any special one?

The SPEAKER. They must be acted on or referred in their order.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not yet in order.

Mr. BLAINE. Will it be in order to regard it as five o'clock now by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It would be.

Mr. BLAINE. I think we can so regard it.

Mr. SCHENCK. It will be five o'clock before a count is had.

The SPEAKER. If the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means makes no objection it can be so regarded.

Mr. SCHENCK. I make none.

The SPEAKER. Then the House stands adjourned till Monday at twelve o'clock.

The House accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty-nine minutes) adjourned.

SCHOOL LOT IN BURLINGTON, IOWA.

Mr. POMEROY. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 469) confirming the title to a tract of land in Burlington, Iowa, have had the same under consideration, and directed me to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage.

Mr. HARLAN. If there is no objection, I should be very glad to have that bill taken up and acted upon now. I do not think there will be one Senator who will oppose. It is a very small matter.

Mr. POMEROY. It is merely a burying lot in the city of Burlington, Iowa, that was reserved from sale by the United States for that purpose, but which they have now abandoned.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to confirm and vest all the title of the United States in and to a certain tract of land in the city of Burlington, Des Moines county, in the State of Iowa, described as being west of lot No. 978 in that city, south of Valley street, west of Boundary street, and north of Market street, and which was originally reserved from sale by the United States and dedicated to public burial purposes, in the "Independent School District" of that city, to be forever dedicated to and used by the school district for public school purposes and for no other use or purpose whatever.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NYE asked, and by unanimous consent, obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 145) in relation to the coast defense; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the joint Committee on Ordnance.

REFUNDING OF DUTIES.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 448, for the return of certain duties erroneously exacted.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 448) to refund duties erroneously exacted in certain cases was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to importers in the city of New York, in moneys receivable for duties, the excess of duties exacted and paid upon importations and merchandise subject to specific duties, made subsequent to the passage of the tariff act of the 2d of March, 1861, and prior to the passage of the act of the 14th of July, 1862, caused by the non-allowance by the collector of the port of New York for draft upon such importations, as provided by sections fifty-eight and fifty-nine of the act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, approved March 2, 1799.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like some explanation of that bill. I do not understand what it is.

Mr. MORGAN. The act of March 2, 1861, provided for the collection of specific duties. A circular from the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, issued to collectors of customs, dated March 21, 1861, directed allowances for tare, draft, &c., to be made in accordance with sections fifty-eight and fifty-nine of the general collection act of 1799, which were again brought into operation. Allowances for tare and draft were made in the ports of Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and other ports throughout the United States, under the act of 1861 and under the Treasury circular referred to, in accordance with the uniform practice of the Government under all previous specific tariff acts; but the collector of customs at the port of New York did not make any allowance for draft in cases where tare was allowed, declaring that both allowances could not be made on the same article; in other words, that tare only should be allowed on merchandise imported in packages, and draft only in cases of merchandise imported in bulk. In order to test the point before the courts some importers of New York protested, and in the case of Napier vs. Hiram Barney the court held that the importer was entitled to the allowance of both tare and draft under the acts of 1799 and 1861. The Secretary of the Treasury having acquiesced in the decision of the courts, the duties exacted contrary thereto and paid under protest were refunded to the importers. These petitioners ask that in cases where protests were not made the same allowance be made to them as where there was protest. I have a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject, which I will read:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 4, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note dated the 24th ultimo, submitting a letter of Mr. Moses H. Grinnell, of New York, addressed to you under date of February 13, 1868, (which letter is herewith respectfully returned) relative to securing the enactment by Congress of a resolution authorizing the return of duties exacted at the port of New York in alleged violation of law.

The excess of duties referred to in the communication of Mr. Grinnell was exacted by reason of non-allowance for "draft," as prescribed by the fifty-eighth section of the general collection act of 1799, on articles paying specific duties.

The act of March 2, 1861, provided for the collection of specific duties; and Treasury circular of March 21, 1861, directed that allowances for tare, draft, &c., were to be made in accordance with sections fifty-eight and fifty-nine of the act of 1799, which were again brought into operation.

But in view of Treasury circular dated March 24, 1847, directing that draft and tare should not be allowed on the same article, the former applying to merchandise in bulk and the latter to goods in packages, draft was not allowed at the port of New York on goods in packages. It was, however, allowed on such goods at the ports of Boston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore.

In order to test the point before the courts, some importers protested at the port of New York; and, in the case of Napier vs. Barney, the court held that the importer was entitled to both draft and tare under the acts of 1799 and 1861.

The Department having acquiesced in this decision, the duties exacted contrary thereto and paid under protest were refunded to the several importers. But no authority existed to refund to those who had not paid under protest; and it is for the relief of the latter class, I understand, that the resolution above referred to is desired.

The case may be considered an exceptional one, in view of the fact that draft was allowed at the ports of Boston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, and was not allowed at New York. This was in effect a violation of the clause in the Constitution (article one, section seven,) which declares that "all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."

Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that the proposed legislation would be eminently proper.

I am, very respectfully,

H. McCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. EDWIN D. MORGAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

I have here, also, the circular of Mr. Secretary Chase, dated March 21, 1861, in which it is stated:

"That in allowances on account of tax, draft, &c., on goods subject to specific duty under the new tariff, officers of the customs will be governed by the provisions of the fifty-eighth and fifty-ninth sections of the general collection act of March 2, 1799, which are again brought into operation."

This bill and these papers were before the Committee on Finance, and they thought the claim was entirely just, and they have unanimously reported in favor of the bill. If necessary a limit can be fixed on the amount to be paid, which I will propose if it is deemed needful.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. It is supposed that the amount of duties to be refunded is not far from $50,000, but so as to have the amount large enough to cover all demands I will offer this amendment:

And the sum of $60,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect the objects of this act.

It is not known exactly what the sum is, but perhaps it is well enough to make the appropriation $60,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. I would inquire of the Senator who has charge of this bill whether there is any correction necessary to be made touching the collection of duties in any other ports; whether New York is the only place in which those collections were made illegally and improperly; whether the committee inquired as to that?

Mr. MORGAN. It would appear that the Treasury circular issued in 1861 was carried into effect in all the other ports of the country. Mr. Barney was the only collector who objected.

Mr. CONNESS. That appears by the investigation?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir; that appears by the investigation.

CONTRACTORS FOR IRON-CLADS.

Mr. DRAKE. I move that the Senate take up the joint resolution (S. R. No. 100) for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels of war and steam machinery.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the motion; but before announcing the result,

Mr. STEWART. That resolution will certainly lead to discussion, and I desire to call up to-day, and I should like to do it in the morning hour, a bill to remove political disabilities.

Mr. DRAKE. I hope the Senator will allow me to call this resolution to come up now.

Mr. STEWART. Let me make a single remark. It is necessary that the bill to which I refer should be considered to-day, in order that the State governments may go into operation. It will relieve a large number of persons who have been elected to office, and it is very important that the bill should be passed to-day.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, did the Senate agree to take up the joint resolution I mentioned or not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the question pending now.

Mr. DRAKE. I appeal to the Senator from Nevada in this matter. I do not see that there is any necessity for discussion over this resolution. The whole matter has been extensively discussed in connection with the bill that was passed the other day. I think the Senate can come to a vote upon it immediately without debate; and as I have never asked the Senate before, I believe, to take up any matter in the morning hour I should be very glad to be gratified in this instance.

Mr. STEWART. The taking up of the bill I have mentioned is no particular gratification to me. It is a matter of public business which must be done; but I withdraw my opposition and am willing that the resolution of the Senator should come up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the joint resolution for consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 100) for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels of war and steam machinery.

The preamble recites that Congress, by an act passed on the 2d of March, 1867, provided for the investigation by the Secretary of the Navy of the claims of all the contractors for building vessels of war and steam machinery, and that pursuant to that act the Secretary of the Navy appointed a naval board for the investigation of the claims in question, and that it appears that the provisions of said act have not been fully conformed to in the findings of the board; and Congress having neither the time nor means for the careful legal investigation which the importance of the subject demands, to relieve it from the further consideration of the subject, and as a final settlement of the claims of the contractors, the resolution provides the claims for building vessels of war and steam machinery, referred to in the act entitled "An act for the relief of certain contractors," &c., approved March 2, 1867, be referred to the Court of Claims, which is hereby vested with jurisdiction under that act, whose duty it shall be to investigate and determine the claims of the several petitioners upon the principles of that act, and its finding is to have the same force and effect as any other judgment of the Court of Claims.

Mr. DRAKE. I have simply to say, sir, unless some Senator calls for information with regard to this resolution, that the whole thing was incidentally discussed the other day in connection with the bill which was urged by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] to pay certain sums of money to certain contractors. If there is any point on which any Senator desires information to show the justice of allowing the men concerned in the construction of these vessels to go into the Court of Claims and establish their claim under the terms of the act of March 2, 1867, I am ready to give that information.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not propose by this resolution to refer to the Court of Claims such claims as were submitted to and rejected by this board of commissioners. Is not that the fact?

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, the act of March 2, 1867, entitled "An act for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels of war and steam machinery," authorized the Secretary of the Navy "to investigate the claims of all contractors for building vessels of war and steam machinery for the same under contracts made after the 1st day of May, 1861, and prior to the 1st day of January, 1864," which investigation was to be made upon a basis specified in that act.

Mr. WILSON. What was the basis?

Mr. DRAKE. It was as follows:

"He shall ascertain the additional cost which was necessarily incurred by each contractor in the completion of his work by reason of any changes or alterations in the plans and specifications required, and delays in the prosecution of the work occasioned by the Government, which were not provided for in the original contract; but no allowance for any advance in the price of labor or material shall be considered unless such advance occurred during the prolonged time for completing the work rendered necessary by the delay resulting from the action of the Government aforesaid, and then only when such advance could not have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary prudence and diligence on the part of the contractor, and from such additional cost, to be ascertained as aforesaid, there shall be deducted such sum as may have been paid each contractor for any reason heretofore over and above the contract price, and shall report to Congress a tabular statement of each case, which shall contain the name of the contractor, a description of the work, the contract price, the whole increased cost of the work over the contract price, and the amount of such increased cost caused by the delay and action of the Government as aforesaid, and the amount already paid the contractor over and above the contract price."

Now, Mr. President, I will state in a few words exactly how this matter stands. There are quite a number of vessels concerning which the claims of the contractors were submitted; but I take the cases of nine of them, all of one class, all built under precisely the same contract, all to be built for the same sum of money, and all of them costing very largely above what the contract price was. For instance, here are three together built by the firm of Secor & Co. and the firm of Ferrine, Secor & Co., to wit: the Manhattan, the Tecumseh, and the Mahopac. They cost over and above the contract price $1,236,101 22. The Navy Department paid over and above the contract price $521,195 58, leaving a balance of excess over the contract price and that amount of $714,905 64. This board that was organized by the Secretary of the Navy under the act of March 2, 1867, allowed to those individuals $115,539 01, leaving unprovided for $599,366 63. That is one case.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know that I fully understand the Senator. Was this $115,000 allowed by the board in addition to the $500,000 paid?

Mr. DRAKE. Yes, sir; that was in addition; and yet notwithstanding all that the Navy Department paid them was above the contract price, and notwithstanding the $115,000 allowed by the board, these individuals have nearly $600,000 of excess of cost over the contract price for which there is no provision.

Now, pass on to the Oneco and the Catawba, built by another concern. Upon these two vessels the whole increased cost was upward of six hundred and sixty-five thousand dollars.

The Navy Department paid them upward of three hundred and twenty-two thousand dollars, and this board, though they stand upon the very same footing as the others, the very terms of the contract being identical, the alterations identical, the delays identical, allow them not one cent though they are five hundred and thirty-three thousand dollars nearly out of pocket. So in the case of the Manayunk, where the whole increased cost was nearly three hundred and forty thousand dollars, one hundred and sixty-six thousand and some odd hundred dollars were allowed them by the Department, nothing allowed them by this board at all, and they are one hundred and seventy-two thousand dollars and upward out of pocket. So in the case of the Tippecanoe, Miles Greenwood, on the same facts, is one hundred and seventy-six thousand dollars and upward out of pocket. So in the case of the Etah, the builders are upward of one hundred and fifty-six thousand dollars out of pocket.

The fact is that this board allowed an account of five of these vessels built in the eastern States the amounts specified in the bill that was passed here the other day, and on the other four of the nine built in the western States they allowed not one single cent; and yet the circumstances under which they were built were precisely the same, the contract the same, the specifications the same, the delays on the part of the Government the same, the difference in the price of gold during the period of building the same! Still this board allowed nothing.

Now, then, the simple request here is "Let us go into the Court of Claims: we had no clear showing before that commission; we sent in our request; they never gave us an opportunity to go before them; or at least they never asked of us any explanation; they never gave us an opportunity to come in there and show them how it was that we were damaged. Let us go before the Court of Claims, not for a general demand upon the Government, but let us go there upon the very specific terms of the act of March, 1867, and if we cannot there show a case whereby we are entitled to relief more than this board granted us then let us be turned out. We know that we are to go there and to stay there years before we get this money or any part of it, before we can get any allowance." We know, as I do know and state to the Senate, the fact that some of those concerns were bankrupted by these contracts; and all that they ask is for the poor privilege of going into the Court of Claims and showing their whole case there; and if, under the terms of the act of March 2, 1867, they are entitled to anything, let the court award it, and if they are not, let the court say they are not, and there is the end of it. That is all that is asked. I, sir, appeal to the Senate on behalf of worthy men who have actually been ruined, some of them, by this whole transaction; and if it is not a case where they can be allowed to go there and show themselves entitled under this act of March 2, 1867, not otherwise, to some additional compensation, then of course the Government will suffer naught by it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I do not know the facts in regard to the contractors for these vessels, but I believe the vessels were iron-clads of a light draft, which were ordered during the war. I remember that the Committee on the Conduct of the War was directed by the Senate to investigate into the condition of those iron-clads, and the Presiding Officer and myself were on a sub-committee that did investigate their condition. We went to Boston and Brooklyn and examined them, and we found that of the twenty there was not one that would float, but they would all go to the bottom as quick as iron not worked into vessels.

Mr. DRAKE. Will the gentleman be so good as to state if that was the case with any of the eight named on the margin of this paper?

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not remember.

Mr. DRAKE. Very well; I hope the gentleman will be specific.

Mr. CHANDLER. In that case the Navy

Department, finding that they had committed a blunder, had built some twenty iron-clads at a cost of many millions of dollars which would not float, undertook to reconstruct them, make them over, turn them into torpedo boats or something of that kind. After they had been reconstructed, made over, and turned into torpedo boats at a vast expense, they were not half as good as they were when they would go to the bottom direct.

Now, sir, I do not know whether these are among those vessels or not; but after all, that should have no effect upon the claims of the contractors, though it does reflect upon the Navy Department. They had no right to build twenty vessels that would go to the bottom when their armament was on board, and then they had no right to undertake to turn them into torpedo boats, at a vast expenditure, and make them worse than they were when they would go to the bottom. Still the contractors undoubtedly obeyed the directions of the Navy Department, and are entitled to compensation. I have nothing to say with regard to the merit of these contractors, but I have something to say with regard to the merits of the Navy Department.

MR. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I was one of the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs who dissented from this report. The chairman, the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES,] and myself did not recommend that this joint resolution should pass. I understand the case to be simply this: the contract price for these vessels was, in round numbers, $14,000,000. By reason of delay and alterations the contractors claimed to be paid $10,000,000 more. The Department allowed and paid them $5,000,000 of those $10,000,000. Then Congress passed the act of 2d of March, 1867, which appointed a commission and authorized that commission to find out what more was due them; and that commission did find out, and reported that $157,000 more were due; not $5,000,000, but $157,000; and the other day we passed a bill appropriating that money, so that it may be paid. Now they ask for liberty to go into the Court of Claims to have the whole subject again investigated. My objection to that is that there is no evidence whatever before Congress that the finding of the commission was not perfectly accurate and just; and until there is some such evidence I think it ought to be final.

Again, if we are determined that no adjudication shall stand, if we set aside every finding that is made by commission and by the Department, we finally shall get a sum of money that will be satisfactory to the claimants, and such as Congress wants to pay, I suppose.

MR. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator if this $5,000,000 that was paid to these men in the first instance was ascertained by a commission?

MR. FRELINGHUYSEN. No; that was paid by the Department.

MR. WILLIAMS. Without any examination by a commission?

MR. FRELINGHUYSEN. Without a commission being appointed; then a commission was appointed.

If there is to be a review and another adjudication of this subject I think it ought to be by a commission, and not by the Court of Claims, for I do not see how the Government can defend itself, how it can be prepared to bring out the truth there. All these contractors can go to the Court of Claims with their books and their agents and state what they believe to be their view of the case, while the solicitor and the Government will be without means of meeting these allegations, when, if we have a commission, they can without being tied down by the rules of evidence examine the whole subject themselves and come to a just conclusion. But I do not see upon what is based the application to have another hearing until it appears that there is something erroneous in the finding of the commission.

MR. DRAKE. That commission had before it the cases of thirty-one different vessels. It allowed on behalf of six of them certain sums of money, and it rejected all the rest of them; and that, too, when the circumstances connected with the building of the whole of them were absolutely almost identical. And it is a very singular feature of this case that the five vessels of one particular class, of which there were nine, that were selected for the granting of this aid were built in eastern ports, and the four where the aid was denied were built in western ports. It may have been an accident, but it is a very significant accident. These vessels were all built under the same circumstances, that the specifications for the construction of them were withheld for long periods, in the case of the nine vessels of the same class for two years from the time when they ought to have been furnished. During that time gold went up from 118 to 282, and was fluctuating between 150 and 282 the most of the time. Every single article that entered into their construction was of course greatly increased, the delays caused by the Government itself being the cause of loss by that increase of price.

Now, I beg to submit in opposition to the remarks of the Senator from New Jersey, that the report bears upon its very face the want of complete and thorough investigation. Why should there be six vessels selected out of thirty-one, and twenty-five built under the same circumstances completely rejected? That shows that there was not sufficient examination.

MR. FRELINGHUYSEN. May I ask my friend a question? Does it appear anywhere that the circumstances of the twenty-five vessels were like those of the six? I think with as much propriety you might say that if an arbitration allowed carpenters and architects an extra price for building six houses, therefore they must allow the same advance on any other twenty-four houses that might be built in the course of the year.

MR. DRAKE. As to nine of them I can state the facts to be these, and they are the great points in this investigation. I stated them the other day: that the contract called for the delivery of the specifications to the contractors at the time of the signing of the contract; that none of them were delivered until twenty-eight days afterward, and that from that time on for two years the complete specifications were not delivered, though it is a fact that the contract called for the construction of the vessels within the period of six months. And so during all that long time of the high rate of gold these contractors had to go on and construct that work, with the prices of everything doubled, trebled, and quadrupled, by reason of the rise in the price of gold.

MR. NYE. I should like to ask the honorable Senator a question. I think he is laboring under a slight mistake in regard to the character of that report. The board reported simply upon five, but I do not understand that they reported adversely on the others.

MR. DRAKE. They simply set it down in the table "none," "none," &c. That is all.

MR. NYE. Not an adverse report. If the Senator will turn to the report made two years ago upon the same subject he will find that these vessels were reported upon for various amounts.

MR. DRAKE. If it be not the will of the Senate that under the circumstances these contractors, who are ruined by these contracts unless they can get some relief, should have the poor privilege of going into the Court of Claims, and there asking the court to give them such relief merely, simply, as the Government has said it is willing they should have under the act of March 2, 1867, then I have done my duty to them, and I have nothing further to say.

MR. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I felt it to be my duty to vote in committee for this joint resolution, and I think I am authorized in supporting it in the Senate. I do not think the facts stated by the Senator from New Jersey are conclusive against these parties. In the first place, some three years ago the Senate, then in executive session, passed a resolution providing for the appointment of a board to ascertain the losses sustained by these contractors. That board was organized according to that resolution, and reported the losses sustained by the contractors, after five months of session, hearing evidence upon the subject, and requiring each contractor to make an exact statement of every expenditure in the building of each vessel. That report, with the evidence to a considerable extent, came before the Committee on Naval Affairs, and it became my duty to examine it. I was satisfied that these parties had sustained loss to a large amount. The loss amounted very nearly to two million dollars, and I thought that a fair percentage of the loss ought at least to be paid, and I advocated such a bill, and it passed the Senate. It went to the House of Representatives based upon that report. The House Committee of Claims was not willing to agree to the bill. Finally an agreement was arrived at, and the bill passed which has been referred to by the Senator from Missouri, authorizing the appointment of another board, but restricting it in the rule of allowance to this point: that no allowance should be made except the loss was occasioned by the act of the Government. That board was organized, and made its report at this session. My knowledge of the case, as I gathered it from the papers that came with the report of the prior board two years ago, satisfies me that this last board has not been just to these parties. I wish to make no complaint of the Department of the Navy. I think that the Secretary and the heads of bureaus intend to do what is right, but I believe that they are under an influence, because they made the contracts, because the regulated the construction of the vessels, because they interposed the changes in the plans and specifications to such an extent that they cannot, in my opinion, do justice to these parties. That board was organized under the Department; it was not a board provided for by Congress; that is, the persons who constituted the board were not selected by Congress, but selected by the Department.

MR. FESSENDEN. Who were they?

MR. HENDRICKS. I forget now.

MR. DRAKE. The Secretary of the Navy called the board under the act of March 2, 1867.

MR. HENDRICKS. Has the Senator from Missouri the names of the board?

MR. DRAKE. I have their report here.

MR. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator give the names?

MR. DRAKE. Commodore J. B. Marchand, Chief Engineer J. W. King, and Paymaster Edward Foster constituted the board.

MR. HENDRICKS. I have no criticisms to make on the board; I dare say they are excellent gentlemen; but I think that they have disallowed in many cases where an allowance ought to be made. I think there are many of these contractors who ought to be relieved under the law of 1867 who are not relieved by that report.

Now, I wish to call the attention of Senators to this fact: that the first board said that the losses sustained were in the neighborhood of two million dollars, and the last board allowed only about two hundred or two hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars—a very great difference. The Senate was willing to pass a bill upon the basis of giving a per cent. of the first allowance. I think that this last report is not what it ought to be. I say this after an examination of the case. As far as I could, I went through the testimony, and so I believe did the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. WILLEY,] who was on a sub-committee with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NYE] and myself. We undertook to ascertain what were the losses of these parties, and I am perfectly satisfied that this award does not do justice. I do not wish to find fault with the gentlemen who composed the board, or to say that they were governed by improper motives. I have no doubt they acted honestly; but I think they have fallen short of doing for these contractors what ought to have been done under the act of 1867. Inasmuch as there is such a great difference between the reports of the two boards is it not now proper that Congress should refer the case to the Government's own court, to be decided upon competent evidence to be produced by the contractors and by the Government itself? We have no occasion to distrust this court; it is of our own organization. We have no reason to distrust the principles upon which the court shall make an allowance, if any be made, because we prescribe them. We say that the court shall not allow for anything unless it shall be made to appear that the loss was occasioned by the act of the officers of the Government. If in any case the Government changed the plan and specifications of the vessels after the contract was made, and thereby delayed the construction of the work, caused a loss to these parties, the court is directed to make an allowance. Does any Senator object to that? Ought it not to be so? When I examined the case two years ago, I had before me a statement of the advance in wages and materials. I regret that I have not got it here. It would astonish Senators to look back and see how rapidly wages went up in our workshops; how rapidly iron and copper and all those things that enter into the construction of vessels and of engines advanced in price upon these men. Six months of delay was enough to ruin a contractor; a year was positive ruin unless he was a man of wealth. In some instances I believe, in some classes of iron, the price went up one hundred per cent. in one year.

What was the effect? A contract was made according to which the specifications were to be furnished immediately. In some cases those specifications were not furnished until long afterward, as the Senator from Missouri has stated. The contractors could not go on; they were delayed. In other cases the specifications were furnished and afterward changed, the vessels increased in size and capacity, the engines increased in capacity and power, and the effect was to delay the construction of the work, and these men had to buy their materials and hire their hands when everything cost them two dollars instead of one, and that because the Department furnished the specifications or changed them after the work should have been far on toward completion. I do not think these men ought to sustain this loss. I know if they were doing work for me I could not consent that they should stand it. If I had changed the plan of a house built for me after the contract was made and it had been commenced, I should feel that I could not live in comfort in the house unless I compensated the contractors for that loss.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to ask the Senator a question. Some one, I do not remember who it was, the other day, in stating the case on the other bill, said that the principle upon which this last report was made up was to allow for all losses that had been occasioned by delays or by changes on the part of the Government; that they picked out all those cases and made an allowance, but they did not make an allowance in cases where the losses were not occasioned by the action or want of action on the part of the Government, thus distinguishing between the classes of cases. For this reason it was said there were two bills. That bill was passed, and now this bill, as I understand it, is to provide for claims made against the Government on general principles on account of the rise of prices, &c., but where the increased cost was not occasioned by the action of the Government itself.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This is confined specifically to the law of March 2, 1867.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The other was.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This is.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It may be; but that statement was made on the other bill which was passed the other day.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will state to the Senator from Maine that this is simply an application for a new trial under the act of 1867.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Exactly; but the question in my mind is whether it has not been tried before this commission, and rejected because the increased cost was not occasioned by any action of the Government. The other bill was distinguished from that case, because the losses there provided for were occasioned, to the extent to which the commission made allowances, by the action of the Government. If that distinction exists between the two classes of cases I want to know why an allowance should be made here.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Whether the board disallowed a claim in any particular case because there was no loss, or because if there were a loss it was the fault of the contractor himself, I am not prepared to say; but of course their allowance is based upon one proposition or the other. Now, these contractors are not satisfied with that, and they ask Congress to allow another trial, a review in a court where they can introduce testimony. They claim that they were not allowed a full hearing before this board, and it is worthy of the consideration of the Senate that this board made up its adjudication in a very short time. I know that to hear the evidence and to examine all these cases would take a good many months of a court that was to go through them and to hear the evidence orally. The first board sat, I think, five months, but the last one a very short time; how long I cannot say. The Senator from Missouri, I believe, did make a statement, but I do not recollect what the time was.

Now, I think I am justified in saying that if I were hearing this case as a judge I would feel authorized to grant a rehearing. I do not believe that justice has been done. The plaintiff asks a rehearing, to go before the Government's own court upon testimony that may be introduced according to law, and have the question decided after full argument and hearing, and then that that decision shall stand. I am not afraid that the Government will suffer by that course. I am not satisfied to see these men stripped of their fortunes in an enterprise that commends them to the gratitude of the country, instead of to constant loss and the destruction of their estates.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President—

Mr. SHERMAN. Unless there can be a vote on this joint resolution, I feel it to be my duty to call for the special order of the day.

Mr. DRAKE. I hope this resolution will be allowed to pass. My impression is that the debate is over. I have nothing more to say about it. I only ask for a few minutes indulgence.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand other Senators desire to debate it. I have no objection to the vote being taken, but the special order comes up at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate pass by the special order informally?

Mr. DRAKE. For a little while.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I object to that.

Mr. DRAKE. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that this matter will take but a few minutes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Wisconsin wishes to speak, and I may want to say something myself.

Mr. HOWE. I do not want to occupy any time. I want to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to laying aside the special order informally. It can, therefore, only be laid aside on motion.

Mr. DRAKE. I move that the regular order be laid aside for a little while, just to get through with this matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. I assure the Senator that while I am in favor of his resolution, and shall vote for it, I see around me a disposition to debate it, and I trust, therefore, the Senate will go on with the regular order. I will agree to take up the resolution at any other time, for I have examined the question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am inclined to think the debate will be short. The Senator from Wisconsin wishes to offer an amendment, but says he is not going to debate it. I think we can get through with this resolution in a few minutes. Let us try it for fifteen minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. If that is done there will be a struggle about the order of business.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I gave notice on Saturday that I should ask the Senate to proceed to-day to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and I think it very important to have that bill considered; but still, if the regular order can be proceeded with, and there is a prospect of concluding it to-day, I should not like to antagonize this bill with it, and will content myself with giving notice that I shall try to call it up to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator from Missouri, upon the statements made, will withdraw his motion, because it will only lead to a struggle about the order of business.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Maine has already announced that he wishes to-morrow to call up the appropriation bill. This resolution will take longer some other time than now, and from the indications I think we can get through with it in a few minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I gave way on Saturday, and I trust the Senate will now go on with the special order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let us have fifteen minutes for this resolution.

Mr. DRAKE. I only ask fifteen minutes. If we cannot get through with it in that time I shall not press it further to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the special order be postponed for fifteen minutes.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 17, noes 11.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution (S. R. No. 100) for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels of war and steam machinery is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend the resolution by adding the following proviso:

Provided, That no claim shall be so referred in favor of Secor & Co.; Perrine, Secor & Co.; Harrison Loring; the Atlantic Works, of Boston; Aquila Adams; M. F. Merritt; Tomlinson, Hartup & Co.; or to Messrs. Poole & Hunt, or any or either of them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on this amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is not right. The Senate voted down the principle of that amendment the other day.

Mr. HOWE. Perhaps they will do it again to-day. I want to try it on.

Mr. HENDRICKS. After full discussion it was voted down.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from Indiana said a short time since that, having investigated the facts in reference to these contracts, he believed there ought to be a new trial, that justice had not been done the contractors by the board recently appointed by the Secretary of the Navy. He may be right in that; but there should be an end to these rehearings at some time. So far as the parties named in this amendment are concerned, they have had two rehearings, two judgments in their favor, and I understand they have another claim growing out of these very contracts pending before the Secretary of the Navy now; and here is a joint resolution which proposes to give them a third rehearing in the Court of Claims. I think that is too many.

The Senator says that the principle of this amendment was voted down by the Senate the other day. I think he is slightly mistaken about that. There was a bill before the Senate the other day to pay the very parties mentioned in the proviso a certain sum of money awarded to them by this board of naval officers. Knowing that it was to be followed by the joint resolution now before the Senate I tried to secure the assent of the Senate to an amendment which should make the sum provided in that bill a full discharge of all claims those parties had against the Government growing out of these contracts. The Senator from Indiana was willing to concede a part of that, but not the whole. The amendment that I asked to be put upon that bill was not put upon it; so that the Senate voted to appropriate to the parties mentioned in the proviso the whole sum provided by the board. Now, here is a joint resolution which offers to them the same opportunity to sue in the Court of Claims that it provides for these other contractors who did not have anything from the naval board. I think, as the parties named in the proviso have taken one judgment from the Secretary of the Navy and taken another from the board constituted by the Secretary of the Navy and approved by the bill which passed here the other day, that, so far as those suitors are concerned, there should be an end of litigation, and if this resolution passes at all it should pass only for the relief of those who did not get a judgment for anything from the naval board.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to amend the amendment by adding the following:

Upon any vessel upon which an allowance was made by the board organized under the act of March 2, 1867.

So that the proviso will read:

Provided, That no claim shall be so referred under this act in favor of Secor & Co.; Perrine, Secor, & Co.; Harrison Loring; the Atlantic Works, of Boston; Aquila Adams; M. F. Merritt; Tomlinson, Hart-appee & Co.; or to Messrs. Poole & Hun; or any or either of them, upon any vessel upon which an allowance was made by the board organized under the act of March 2, 1867.

The amendment which I propose to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin will make this legislation agree with the bill that passed the Senate the other day.

Mr. HOWE. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Indiana will not be agreed to. The effect of it is to just divide the bill of particulars which has been tried by this naval board. Each of these parties mentioned in the proviso has had a judgment there, a judgment in their favor. That judgment only included a part of their claim; but so far as the judgment was in their favor they have taken the benefit of it. The judgment was upon some of the items in their claim, and the judgment went against them upon some other items. The Senator proposes that they shall stand by the judgment upon those items where judgment was in their favor and that they shall go into the Court of Claims under this resolution to recover for those items on which judgment went against them before the naval board. If the Senate agrees to it of course I cannot help it.

Mr. CRAGIN. I hope the amendment to the amendment will be adopted. If it is adopted, it leaves all parties standing upon an equal footing. Secor & Co. built about one fourth of all the iron-clads built for the Government. By the bill that passed the other day they were allowed on three vessels; on the others they were allowed nothing. There are reasons why they should be allowed on the others just exactly as good as there are why other parties should be allowed. The reason for referring this subject to the Court of Claims is this: these claimants came before the Committee on Naval Affairs and asked us to examine their claims; but they told us at the same time that they were aware we had not the time to investigate these matters; that they involved the examination of large numbers of witnesses, and of long and continuous accounts, and if we would allow them, if we had not the time to examine them, to go to the Court of Claims to institute and prosecute this examination, they would be satisfied, and the Committee on Naval Affairs agreed to this. It is just and right, in my judgment, and I hope that course will be taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE.]

Mr. HOWE. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. To illustrate the force of the amendment, I will state to the Senate just this: taking as an illustration the firm of Secor & Co., I believe they constructed either seven or nine iron-clads; I think every one of those vessels was in battle and did efficient service. This board has allowed upon either two or three of those vessels. The plans and specifications were changed regarding the others, but they have had no allowance upon them. Now, my amendment proposes that in regard to the vessels upon which an allowance was made by the board they shall not go before the Court of Claims; but in regard to the vessels upon which no allowance was made they shall stand just like the other contractors.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Fowler, Harlan, Hendricks, Johnson, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wade, and Willey—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Howard, Howe, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Pomeroy, Trumbull, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Conkling, Connors, Corbett, Dixon, Edmunds, Grimes, Henderson, Norton, Ross, Saulsbury, Thayer, and Tipton—13.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. DRAKE. There is a verbal amendment which ought to be made in the joint resolution. The resolution undertakes to set out the title of the act of March 2, 1867. It says, "An act for the relief of certain contractors, and so forth." I wish to have the title set out in full. I move to strike out the words "and so forth," in the fifth line, and to insert "for the construction of vessels of war and steam machinery." That gives the title to the previous act in full.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made if there be no objection.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Connors, Cragin, Davis, Drake, Ferry, Fowler, Hendricks, Johnson, Morton, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wade, Willey, and Yates—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Doolittle, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Howe, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Williams, and Wilson—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Conkling, Corbett, Dixon, Edmunds, Grimes, Henderson, Howard, Morrill of Maine, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ross, Saulsbury, Thayer, and Tipton—16.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. HOWE subsequently said: I ask unanimous consent to correct an error in an amendment made to a joint resolution passed this morning for the relief of certain contractors for vessels of war and steam machinery. I moved a proviso intended to exclude from its operation all that were included in a previous bill which had passed the Senate. I omitted the names of Messrs. Harlan & Hollingsworth, who were introduced into the previous bill by an amendment. I had not the bill as it passed the Senate before me. To put that firm on the same terms as all the other contractors they should be inserted in the proviso. The only regular way, I suppose, is to move a reconsideration.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose the correction can be made by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOWE. I hope the Senate will consent unanimously to insert the name of Harlan & Hollingsworth in the proviso.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment may be made by unanimous consent. Is there objection? There is no objection; and the amendment will be made.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I hold in my hand three Senate pension bills which have been returned from the House of Representatives with amendments. The amendments are similar, and are not concurred in by the Committee on Pensions. The committee report them back adversely. I therefore move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives to one of the bills, say the bill (S. No. 184) granting a pension to Mrs. Corcoran, and ask for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses; and the others can lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator moves that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives to Senate bill No. 184, and ask for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the committee of conference be appointed by the chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. VAN WINKLE, Mr. TRUMBULL, and Mr. EDMUNDS.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the other bills with the amendments lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 425) granting a pension to George Bennett, and the bill (S. No. 280) granting a pension to Michael Hennessy, of Platte county, Missouri, with the amendments of the House of Representatives thereto, were laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 291) giving additional compensation to certain employes in the civil service of the Government at Washington, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

NATIONAL BANKS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order is now before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 440) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance as the fifth section of the bill. The amendment of the committee is in these words:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That section twenty-two of the act aforesaid be so amended that the maximum limit of national circulation, fixed by said act, is hereby increased the sum of $20,000,000, which amount shall be issued only to banking associations organized in States and Territories having a less circulation than five dollars per each inhabitant, and so as to equalize the circulation in such States and Territories in proportion to population.

The amendment of Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, is to add to the amendment of the committee the following words:

And upon the issue of any increased national circulation provided for in this section the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to permanently withdraw an equal amount of United States notes.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from California [Mr. COLE] has the floor on that question.

Mr. MORTON. Is it in order to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not just now. It would be an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. MORTON. I will ask to have my amendment read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

Provided, That the United States notes so retired shall not be obtained by the sale of bonds, but shall be taken from the funds in the Treasury, collected in the ordinary way.

Mr. COLE. Mr. President, I could hardly persuade myself to allow the vote to be taken upon this part of the bill without tendering a few suggestions to the Senate upon it. This fifth section provides for the issuance of $20,000,000 of additional circulation for the use of those States and Territories in which the amount of banking circulation already issued is less than five dollars per capita. It is intended in some degree to equalize the circulation under the laws of the United States authorizing the issue of national bank currency. I do not wish to commit myself to the system of national banks by anything I shall say in favor of this amendment. I look upon it only as some relief for a portion of the United States from the great embarrassment under which that portion is at present suffering.

The South and West, as is well understood I believe by all Senators, are greatly in need of money. This addition of $20,000,000 to them in the form of banking capital or bank issues will afford them only slight relief. It will not entirely meet the emergency. It will not relieve them to any very great extent, but it will afford some relief provided they avail themselves of the offer and take this circulation. Mr. President, those States and Territories of the West and South are the poor portion of the Republic. They are the laboring portions, the productive portions. The other parts of the Union, the North and the East, possess nearly all the capital of the nation. They are the manufacturing portion, the trading portion, the wealthy portion.

There is at present a very great inequality in the distribution of this bank capital; and to this I wish to call the attention of the Senate. In New England at present there is upward of one third of this banking circulation. The total amount issued under the law of 1863 authorizing these national banks is $300,000,000. Of this the New England States have $104,959,981. That amount is apportioned to the people of New England, who constitute only about one twelfth of the total population of the nation. New England and New York, which together contain only about one fifth of the total population of the country, have at present upward of seven twelfths of the entire circulation issued to these national banks. The twelve States comprising New England, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois possess of this $300,000,000 of bank circulation some $265,000,000; and those States contain a population, according to the last census, of less than sixteen millions, certainly at this day less than half the population of the Republic. In all the other thirty-two States and Territories, including the District of Columbia, which must contain a population of about nineteen millions, perhaps at this time twenty millions, there is distributed of this circulation only about one ninth, or $35,000,000 all told.

This, as will be seen, is a very great inequality in the distribution of this circulation. The $20,000,000 that are to be authorized under this fifth section of the bill are to be distributed among some twenty-four States and Territories, and they are the States and Territories that lie west of the Mississippi and south of the Ohio and the Potomac, including the State of Wisconsin. These twenty-four States and Territories, all of which possess less than five dollars per capita of this bank circulation, will be the States and Territories among which the $20,000,000 additional will be distributed. These States and Territories possess at present only about $20,000,000 of banking capital; and I think it will be ascertained by referring to the census that their total population, including the blacks, is about half the population of the whole country, and if this bank capital or circulation were distributed according to the population they would be entitled to $150,000,000. It will appear from these figures that these States which possess nearly all of it enjoy a great money monopoly, for such it really is. This remark is particularly applicable to New England and New York, which possess upward of $177,000,000 of this currency.

But we were told on Friday, by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] that it is absurd to distribute this circulation according to population. I do not contend that it should be distributed according to population entirely; but that there should be some reference to population I think a very clear proposition. But if this be absurd it is an absurdity into which the Congress that passed the law fell; for in the seventeenth section of the act of February 25, 1863, authorizing these national banks, we find the following provision:

"That the entire amount of circulating notes to be issued under this act shall not exceed $300,000,000, $150,000,000 of which sum shall be apportioned to associations in the States, in the District of Columbia, and in the Territories, according to representative population, and the remainder shall be apportioned by the Secretary of the Treasury among associations formed in the several States, in the District of Columbia, and in the Territories, having due regard to the existing banking capital, resources, and business of such States, District, and Territories."

Thus it will be seen that by a provision of the law half of it was to be distributed according to representative population; and if that be an absurdity clearly it is one into which Congress itself fell.

But this circulation is not to be distributed in accordance with wealth. It is to be distributed for the accommodation of the people and in accordance with the business requirements of the people. A larger proportion of it is required in new countries in accordance with the amount of business than in old countries or well-established communities. In the commercial centers, as, for instance, New York and Boston, there are such institutions as clearing-houses. Banks are abundant there through which the business is done by a system of checking, a system of credits. I presume not one tenth of the business in the city of New York is done by the actual use of money, but, on the other hand, by the use of credits and checks. It is very different in the new States, where the population is scattered, where people are strangers to each other, and have but little credit upon which to rely. There business has to be done upon a money basis. There is need, therefore, in nearly every transaction, of money with which to perfect it. There is, therefore, much difference between the older communities; these business centers, and the new States and Territories in this respect.

The proposition that is pending here is not to withdraw any of this circulation from the States which now possess it. It is conceded by this bill to be proper that the States which now possess this circulation should retain all they have. There is no disposition at all to interfere with them. The proposition is to provide some circulation, a small amount, for this portion of the Union, where it is at present exceedingly scarce.

It is well understood that business is very much impeded in the West and South for the want of money; and if capitalists are found there who can invest in United States bonds to the amount of $20,000,000 and deposit them with the Treasurer and draw ninety per cent. of bank notes, which they may in turn lend to their neighbors for such security as the neighbors can furnish in the particular localities, why should not they be allowed to do this? It is a privilege that is now only enjoyed by the people of the East and the North. At present the South and the West depend to a very great extent upon the East and the North for the money with which to prosecute their business; but the business capacity and wealth of the people of the South and the West are not understood at the North, or where these banks are located; and so they have no credit there, and, as a consequence, if money is borrowed where they have no credit a larger interest is to be paid, and it is not an unusual thing for the people of the West and the South to pay enormous interest, often as high as two per cent. a month, a ruinous rate.

But whenever the proposition is made from any quarter to furnish these people with circulation, which they so much stand in need of, the cry of inflation is raised. This is a sort of hobgoblin or bugbear brought forward for the purpose of frightening the representatives of the people from furnishing this needed circulation. It is a specious cry. If there is a liability to inflation by the issues of more bank circulation, certainly there must already be inflation in New England and New York, where they have greatly surpassing their proportion of that already issued; but they at the North and East do not complain of inflation. They are full of money and bank circulation; they have it in abundance, and they wish to retain what they have, but are at the same time unwilling to furnish those portions of the Union that are in want of it with a small proportion, such as may afford some accommodation to those sections. The people of the West and the South of these twenty-four States and Territories, if furnished these $20,000,000 of circulation, would be in some degree independent of their more wealthy neighbors at the North and East; and to put them in this condition will not result at all in an unfavorable inflation of the currency. It cannot have that result; it cannot produce that effect.

But the statement that is made for the purpose of preventing this addition to the circulation is that it will impair the public credit. Let us for a moment examine that. The public credit does not depend upon the amount of circulation; it depends upon the success of business, upon the productive industry of the country, upon its growing wealth; and everything that tends to check the productive industry of the country, everything that has for its object the suppression of labor and industry, must affect the public credit unfavorably.

The Secretary of the Treasury has made a recommendation that this circulation be furnished at the South. I believe at some time he has recommended also that a portion of the circulation that has been furnished to the East or North, particularly to New England and New York, shall be withdrawn and furnished to these more destitute sections. In a letter of the Secretary, dated in 1866, I find the following paragraph:

"I also think it a matter of great importance that provision should be made to meet the wants of those States which have been in rebellion. Banking facilities are necessary to develop the industrial interests of the South, and to stimulate the production of those staples which enter so largely into the financial interests of the country. At the same time it would be wise policy to afford the people of that section an opportunity to become peculiarly interested in the successful maintenance of the Government of the United States; and, inasmuch as Congress has assumed entire control of the currency of the country, and, to a very considerable extent, of its banking interests, prohibiting the interference of State governments, it would seem to be the plain duty of Congress to make adequate provision to meet the business wants of all sections of the country in the way of banking facilities."

That recommendation has been entirely disregarded thus far, and always upon the plea that there would be something wrong and detrimental to the country in adding to the circulation.

The proposition contained in the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to withdraw an equal amount of greenbacks to the amount of bank circulation which is allowed to be put forth, is not one that meets my approval. It would be necessarily adding so much to the interest-bearing debt of the country, unless the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana should prevail with it. We have not the greenbacks or United States notes with which to make the exchange, or with which to supply the deficiency; they must necessarily be raised by issuing interest-bearing par bonds; there is no other way we have for raising them, and it would therefore be a conversion of $100,000,000 of non-interest-bearing securities into so much bearing interest. This, in my judgment, would be a proposition most unfavorable to the Government, and it would not at all relieve the country from the stringency in the money market. It would leave the amount of money in the country precisely as it is. It would afford some little relief in this point of view; it would allow this banking circulation to be taken in those Territories and States where it is now scarce, but that is all the relief that would flow from it; and as the drainage of money is from the West and South to the East and the North, there would, in a little while, unquestionably be the same dilemma under which those sections of the Union are now suffering.

The amount of money afloat at present is much too small, as I believe, for the business requirements of the country. The total amount of circulation is something less than seven hundred million dollars; the amount of United States notes is about three hundred and fifty-six millions; the amount of fractional currency about thirty millions; the amount of national bank circulation is $300,000,000; the amount of gold perhaps on the western coast would bring it up to about seven hundred millions. If the population is thirty-five millions, this would be only twenty dollars per capita to the whole population, and this in a depreciated currency which is equivalent to gold or silver to only about fourteen dollars per head. This is less by far than is used in the other civilized and commercial countries that compete with the United States in business and wealth. In England, I think, the amount per capita is at least twice that. In France it is as much as in England, or more. I have not before me the figures, but, if I remember well, such is the fact.

In my opinion it is the duty of the Government to provide the kind of money that is needed by the people. That is a sovereign power. It is provided by the Government in nearly all the civilized countries. The Government takes it upon itself to fix the value and denomination of coins. The Government does not furnish the gold and silver; it issues the gold and silver in the form of coin to those who bring them to the Government for the purpose of being reduced to coin; and there has never happened such a thing in modern times as a Government refusing to coin gold and silver for those who have gold and silver to be thus converted. There has never been an attempt to restrict the amount of hard money in any country. There has never been any complaint on the ground that there was too much good money afloat, and why should there be a distinction between the money that is made of gold and silver and that which is issued by the Government as representatives of the value of gold and silver? There is, in my opinion, no good reason to be urged why the Government should not take it upon itself to issue the representative of money which is in the form of paper the same as it takes upon itself to fix the value of coins and the description of money when we are without paper. The only duty on the part of the Government is to see that the money which is issued as the representative of gold and silver shall be well secured, and this plan has been adopted by this Government in the banking system that is in vogue. The Government has required security to be deposited in the Treasury; upon that this representative of value is issued. As long as this money is well secured why should not the amount that is to be issued be left to the requirements of business? If any person or any section of the country has the security to tender to the Government for this representative money why should not that section of country or that individual, if it be needed by the requirements of business, be permitted to put his securities in that form in which they shall be available to him? The whole duty of the Government will be to see to it that the securities are perfect and abundant. The laws of trade can safely be trusted to fix the amount of good money that may at any time be required.

The only danger that has ever manifested itself of too much money in a country has been of money that has not been properly secured or money of low value. There is danger of inflation when coins are reduced in value by the addition of alloys. There is danger of an inflation of the currency when the securities are inadequate, when there is no disposition, it may be, or no purpose on the part of those who issue it to redeem the money that is put afloat. In such a case it is an object on the part of those who have the issuance of the money to put forth as much as they can, as much as they can persuade people to receive. It is a gaining operation with them. But if they are to leave on deposit the value of the money which they receive, it will be different if the deposit can be of more value to them, can be used in some way better than in the form of money, they will so use it, and there is no danger whatever of the country ever becoming flooded with good money.

The banking system we now have I believe to be the best that has ever been adopted in this country. It is the safest we have ever had. It is not a new system; it had been adopted in many of its features in several of the States of the Union. It had been recommended by writers on political economy long before it was adopted by the United States Government. I find in a work published in 1852 on the Progress of Nations by an author of considerable notoriety, Mr. Seaman, the exact plan of the present national banking system of the United States laid down in detail. I believe it to be the very best system that has thus far been adopted, but it is defective in many respects. It would be better, in my judgment, if there could be great freedom on the part of all the citizens, who have the securities that are required by the Government, to surrender to the Treasury and receive in lieu of them United States notes, rather than to leave the bonds to draw interest for those who deposit them as security. This would result in withdrawing from our interest-bearing indebtedness at least the $300,000,000 that are now issued as national bank circulation and replacing them with a like amount of non-interest-bearing greenbacks. We should thus save at least $25,000,000 a year interest. The interest that is now paid in gold on this amount is $18,000,000, equivalent to $25,000,000 in greenbacks or United States notes.

Besides, this system of banking is liable to many abuses. It is a very great privilege to those who can avail themselves of it. It certainly amounts, on the part of those who receive it, to a privilege of drawing double interest upon their capital. They take their bonds to the Treasury, leave them on deposit, and receive ninety per cent. of circulation which they loan out upon interest. Thus the bankers receive interest not only upon the $100,000 deposited with the Treasury, but also on the $90,000 of circulating notes which they receive. Then, why may not a man who receives his $90,000 in circulation immediately convert that again—less the amount to be kept on hand—into United States bonds in some other bank, or invest it in some other banking operation, and receive circulation again to the amount of, perhaps, seventy odd thousand dollars? After he has received his new circulation, why may he not again invest it in United States bonds and receive ninety per cent. again, and so multiplying his interest until he receives thirty or forty per cent. on the original investment of $100,000? To be sure there is a provision in the law that the persons receiving the circulation shall not use it in a way to increase their banking capital; but that prohibition applies only to the bank to which the circulation is issued, and what is to hinder a person receiving the circulation first issued from making the same disposition of it in some other bank?

The fact is, Mr. President, this banking privilege that is granted by the laws of the United States is an exceedingly advantageous one, one of immense value to the people who have so hastily and early availed themselves of it. It is of great advantage to the people of New England and New York, who have absorbed so large a portion of it; and I do not wonder very much at their extreme anxiety to prevent any addition to the amount, or to prevent the people of the South and the West, where there is more poverty and more destitution, from adding to their independence of the section where this banking capital has been taken up.

I believe, Mr. President, that there should be no hesitation on the part of the Senate in affording this little measure of relief to these destitute portions of the country. It will add to their productiveness. At present they are in a withered, decaying condition; they are paralyzed for the want of circulation; they are unable to move their crops for the want of money; and if this relief is not permitted, they will decline in wealth, they will continue in their present condition of poverty and distress, and after a while will become even less productive, and as a consequence less advantageous to the wealthy portions of the Union, the East and the North. Whatever is done to encourage industry, whatever is done to add to the productiveness of the South and the West, will but add to the general prosperity of the nation and improve its credit. I hope therefore, Mr. President, that this amendment will be acquiesced in.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, when a gentleman sets out with an unsound principle at the start and claims that paper money is just as good as gold and silver coin, you may expect that fallacy to run through his entire argument. Now, I am surprised at the disinterested generosity of the Senator from California. If there is a Senator on this floor who ought to be a stickler for a speedy restoration of specie payments, it is the Senator from California; for by an irredeemable paper currency the relative power of gold is lessened, the purchasing power of it is vastly diminished, and this is an evil under which the people of California and all other gold and silver producing States and Territories have been groaning for years, ever since the introduction into the country of this unusual flood of paper money, and yet the Senator from California proclaims here that paper money is just as good as gold or silver.

Mr. COLE. I am sure the Senator from Vermont does not intend to misrepresent me. I spoke of paper money well secured, secured by the value it represents.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I understood the limitations which the Senator laid down, and he evidently meant that the kind of paper money which we have issued is just as good as gold or silver and just such as he is ready to issue $20,000,000 more of without conditions. Does not the fact stare him in the face that gold is forty per cent above paper? Is not that a significant showing of the fallacy of his argument? Have we not enough of that kind of circulation? If we had not too much of it, it would be at par, or else we have destroyed the credit of our country—an idea that I do not admit; but I will say that we are in danger of destroying it when we take steps in the direction of expansion instead of contraction.

But the Senator goes on further to state that when this paper money is issued by a party who manifests no purpose of redeeming it, then it is of less value. Here is an example: there is a proposition before us which proposes not to redeem any portion of this paper money, but to increase the amount of it by the sum of $20,000,000, and yet the Senator from California is one of the earliest opponents of an amendment offered by me providing that if the national banking circulation shall be so increased, we shall retire an equal amount of United States notes.

But the Senator from California has iterated and reiterated the idea that the North and the East possess the wealth of the country, and are opposing this measure for increasing the circulation. Why, sir, a Senator from New England [Mr. Wilson] has proposed to increase it five times the amount proposed by the bill of the committee. Only one of the Senators from New England, the Senator from Connecticut, has shown any disposition to oppose the proposition, although I think the whole Senate will be justified in opposing it if it comes in the shape of a naked expansion of paper money. Why, then, does the Senator from California come out here with a statement that New England and New York are particularly averse to this increase of banking circulation, or averse at all to allowing other parts of the country to enjoy the same privileges which they enjoy? Fix your laws as you please, and the North and the East will try to endure it; but the evil of an inflated currency is not a local one; the whole country has an interest in getting out of the present quagmire, not in plunging deeper into it.

I have sometimes thought that some gentlemen in the West, if they could get a measure before the Senate that would confiscate the property of the widows and orphans in the East, for they own a pretty large share of what there is there, would be willing to do it. Why, sir, the wealth that has been accumulated in New England and the North has been the slow growth of two centuries. Can gentlemen expect that new States like California, Nevada, and other of our western States, as prosperous and flourishing as they may be—and I rejoice that they are—are going to jump at once into the wealth and the civilization of centuries? Have these States any less banking capital now than they had before the creation of the national banking system? I should like to know if the creation of the national banking system has diminished the amount of banking capital of any of those western States about which we hear so much. Did they not help to establish the new system? The people of my State when this system was adopted had a banking system with which they were content, and they had a much larger circulation than they now have. It was a system that contributed largely by the taxes imposed upon it to the support of the State government. Our people went into the national banking system reluctantly; and it was not until after forcible measures of legislation were adopted, a year subsequent to the passage of the banking law, that the North generally adopted it. They went into it because they found that their capital was to be slowly but surely confiscated if they did not go into it. They went into it because they had the capital and the Government needed it. Was there any more reason why the western States should not go in than the eastern? I do not like to hear the eastern and northern States reproached for stepping forward at a time when the Government was in peril and bringing forth their treasures—the careful savings of generations of men—to the support of the Government. Why did not the West step forward and avail themselves of the privilege? They say they have the means now, and they must have had the means then or they accumulated it during the war. They had the same opportunity that we had, and money is worth as much in the West for banking purposes as in the East; much more; the dividends are larger.

Now, Mr. President, for all the wealth that is accumulated in the East and the North men work there more hours per day, and their capital is employed at a less price, than in any other portion of the Union. Why, sir, the men in the Northeast work from twelve to fourteen and fifteen hours a day; and that is the way they accumulate wealth; they loan their capital for six per cent., and that is the way they accumulate their wealth. That is not the case with the western States. There their climate is such and their facilities in the way of agriculture are such that they do not work half the year anyhow—the winter is a holiday—and they work a very small number of hours usually when they do work; and when they loan their capital their laws permit them to take ten per cent., and in some places permit them to take more.

Now, Mr. President, in relation to the matter that is specially before us, it is simply a plain proposition that if we increase the amount of the national banking circulation then that we shall retire an equal amount of United States notes. I think that is wise, not only financially, but I think it is eminently wise politically, that we should not increase, should not inflate our currency at this time. Is it not obvious that our United States notes are considered worth less in the market than any other securities that we have? Why should we not either retire them or refuse to put out anything more akin to them, or anything to compete with and depress them still more? Our bonds sell for one hundred and ten or one hundred and twelve, making them ten or twelve per cent. above our national bank note circulation. Our people believe one will be paid and fear as to the other. It seems to me that it is perfectly plain we have got too much currency of some sort out already; and if gentlemen in the West or in California or in any other section of the country expect to make bank note circulation available in their localities until we resume specie payments they are very much mistaken. While there is a suspension of specie payments the capital will flow to the Atlantic coast—to the money centers of the country. It will flow to places where you can find room for all sorts of trade and speculation; you cannot find it in the interior. In my own State the circulation runs off to the Atlantic coast; you cannot keep it in the interior; it will go where there is the greatest opportunity for speculation. When there is anything in the interior which can be purchased at a profit, then paper money will find it out, but not till then.

I hope, Mr. President, that the proposition which I have presented will commend itself to the judgment of the Senate. If we cannot take any active steps by which we are to resume specie payments, let us certainly beware of taking any steps which are to retard that event.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, to vote for the fifth section of the bill without amendment is to favor an inflation of the paper currency of the country; and although the proposed issue is limited to $20,000,000 now, still the proposition is to enter again upon a policy of expansion. I am compelled, in this view, to vote against the section; and the query in my mind is whether the provision will be rendered admissible by either of the amendments suggested. Before remarking upon this, I have a word to say in reply to the honorable Senator from California.

Nothing that he has said, and nothing that can, in truth, be said, will call upon any Representative of the State of New York to apologize for her part in the financial experience of the country since the war began. The State of New York has nothing in that regard to regret or excuse. Far from it. She has done too much and suffered too much to be taunted for any shortcoming or any favor she has received. Her connection with the present banking system is no exception to the claim I thus make for her. When rebellion raised its hand New York had a banking system of her own, matured and perfected by long experience, which supplied the wants of her people, and comforted with her vast resources and her great commerce.

We were satisfied with it. It was, in my belief, a better system than that under which we are living now. Regarded in respect of its relations to the Government, it was free from one contradiction found in the present system which has not yet been reconciled to the satisfaction of unbiased and discerning men.

The general banking system, regarded as a fiscal problem between the Government and the people, involves an interest in coin of six per cent. per annum upon bonds exempt from taxation, paid by the United States to corporations for circulating a currency for which the United States are ultimately responsible, and which currency they might themselves have issued without the expense of one farthing beyond the paper and engraving and the cost of striking it off. I have heard a great many financiers deal with this point, and I have never heard it so disposed of as to make it appear a good fiscal arrangement for the Government of the United States.

Without pursuing this I repeat that New York had a banking system satisfactory to herself, a system carefully guarded, and the people of New York were content; a system guarded against inflation, for, although banking circulation was based upon mortgages of real estate, and so far unchecked in volume, it was also based upon State stocks to the extent of one half, which stocks could never be increased a farthing without a popular vote of the people of the State consenting to the increase.

In this way it will be seen the basis of banking while flexible was safe from undue expansion.

Thus the people of the State of New York had provided for themselves a banking system ever within their own control, ever secure in its workings, under which they had a currency and banking facilities adapted to their wants. When the war broke out the banking interest like all others were asked to come forward and lay their offerings upon the altar of the country. Which interest was it, I ask, that leaped forward with a bound sooner than the banks and the capitalists of the State of New York? Without having the figures before me, and speaking only from recollection, I assert the banks advanced to the Government their entire capital, and then, as the trustees of their depositors, they advanced a sum which surprised the nation and the Government.

After this, despite all this, the banks of New York, in common with the banks of the other States, were subjected to national legislation; the long and short of which was to tax them out of existence, and they were compelled to lie down upon a Procrustean bed of national finance and be shortened if they were found too long, or stretched if they were found too short.

Without dwelling upon the history of this transaction, Mr. President, I think it ought at least to exempt New York from invidious comments respecting her part in the revolution by which her moneyed institutions were swept away, and to exempt her citizens and her representatives from the necessity of defending their State in this behalf.

It is true, sir, that the Comptroller of the Currency departed and allowed others to depart from the letter and, I think, from the spirit of the law in distributing the bank currency; and, as far as that is true, and as far as the inequality can now properly be removed without flying to other and greater evils, undoubtedly it should be done. It is proposed now to do it by a mere addition of $20,000,000 to the paper currency of the country. This is the proposition as it came from the committee. This has no objection for those, as the honorable Senator from Vermont says, who believe that a piece of paper with the stamp of the Government upon it is money just as valuable as a piece of coin of the same denomination. I am not of these believers. I believe that coin, like a barrel of flour or any other property, the product of human labor, has a value which consists in the fact that it represents the cost of production. And therefore it is, without entering into particulars, that I discard these theories of paper money. And because I do, without stopping to argue the question, I do not see how I can vote to increase, on any pretense, the volume of paper currency, whether the increase at the moment proposed be twenty millions or something more or something less. I believe that the good of the country, considered at large, and the individual prosperity and contentment of the people, consists largely in bringing down prices, in short, in restoring to wholesome relationships values and the medium paid for values; that is, in the restoration of specie payments.

I content myself with assigning these reasons for objecting to the provision as it was reported by the Committee on Finance. And now, Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Indiana, and also the Senator from Massachusetts, if he means to renew hereafter the amendment proposed by him and withdrawn, to attend to the question presented by those amendments, and see whether upon the whole they help the case?

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont will have the effect of increasing the annual interest account $1,680,000; it will fasten that amount of interest upon us in any aspect in which it can be viewed. The effect of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will be to fasten upon us an interest account amounting to $6,400,000 a year. I will state the process by which I reach this result.

Twenty million dollars of national bank currency is to be issued. For this, and for the whole of it, bonds are to be lodged with the Comptroller of the Currency, upon which is to be paid six per cent. in coin semi-annually, and in addition to that they are divested of the burden of taxation. With gold at 140 this interest is not less than nine and a half, and I think not less than ten per cent. How are these bonds to be furnished? Are they to be issued for the purpose of becoming the basis of this currency? If they were, the process and the effect would be palpable; obviously the whole amount of interest upon them would be added to the interest account. But the Senator from Vermont will say, no; new bonds are not to be issued. Bonds already afloat, upon which the Government is now paying interest, are to be applied to this purpose, and thus no increase whatever of interest is to take place.

Let us examine that for a moment, in connection with the amendment of the Senator requiring the cancellation of "greenbacks," so called. Bonds are afloat, no doubt; the identical $20,000,000 to be employed are afloat, the currency is to be given upon them; and then $20,000,000, the corresponding amount, of United States notes, commonly called "greenbacks," are to be annihilated as an offset, to the end that the volume of the currency may be preserved exactly where it was before. How are these "greenbacks" to be obtained? Are bonds to be issued and sold to obtain them, as the honorable Senator from Indiana fears, and offers his amendment to prevent? If they are, I need not stop to argue that we have the direct, simple transaction of adding the interest of $20,000,000 at six per cent. semi-annually in coin, besides the immunity from taxation.

But the Senator from Vermont will say again, perhaps, as the Senator from Indiana seeks in his amendment to say, no; bonds shall not be sold to obtain greenbacks, but as greenbacks flow in as revenue the Secretary shall subtract the amount and retire or annihilate it as circulating medium. Is this proposed as the mode of avoiding the assumption of interest? If so, will some Senator answer me this: if the people are to be taxed to raise this parcel of the revenue, this $20,000,000 above the necessities of the current outgo of the Government, are we not bound, economically and properly, to take these $20,000,000 of greenbacks and with them pay off $20,000,000 of interest-bearing indebtedness? If we do not do so, but allow this $20,000,000 interest-bearing indebtedness to run, it will be allowed to run only because although we have in our coffers the greenbacks with which to extinguish it, we are compelled to cancel and annihilate them, because in the mean time we have put out $20,000,000 or national bank bills, which they must antidote and offset. Am I not right in saying that in the result you either add to the interest account the interest upon $20,000,000, or, if it is more accurate so to state it, you retain an interest account upon $20,000,000, with which otherwise you might dispense? The mode of statement is only a phrase or technicality in bookkeeping.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Will the Senator give way for a moment?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senator has conjured up unnecessary lions in the track, I think. By the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury it will be seen that he anticipates a revenue from premiums on gold to the extent of about twenty million dollars. If he receives any such amount as that from premiums on gold, of course he sells his gold for greenbacks, and there would necessarily be a sufficient amount of greenbacks which might be retired. The premium on gold, in order to realize $20,000,000, would require the sale of not less than $50,000,000 of gold. Of course, then, there will be that amount of greenbacks on hand. But suppose that were not so, the Senator from New York is in favor of a speedy return to specie payments, and I ask him how we are ever to return unless we are willing to take up these greenbacks and pay interest on the amount. I do not expect any other result. I am willing to meet it now. I expect to have to meet it. Does the Senator expect that we should ever resume specie payments without doing that? Does he expect that we shall resume specie payments and continue forever United States notes in circulation?

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, can it be possible that the statement made by my honorable friend from Vermont is satisfactory to his mind? If it is, let me see if it be satisfactory to any other member of this body who will give me his attention for a moment. The Senator says the Secretary, selling gold, receives a large premium, which premium he turns into greenbacks. To be sure he does; and when it is turned into greenbacks it is in the Treasury, like all the rest of the revenue. What is it then? Has it any peculiarity separating it from the rest of the public money? Is it more saving to use that particular money than any other? Is it not of the first importance that all money not required for current expenses should be devoted to paying off the public debt, the interest on which never stops? Interest is the grievous, blighting feature in all public debts; in our case it is doubly hard to be borne, because our rate of interest is unknown to the national debts of Christendom, except in a single other case. Is it not, I repeat, for the interest of the Treasury and of the people that the Secretary should use this surplus fund and every surplus fund to extinguish the interest-bearing debt? Is not this as clear and as true whether the fund arises from the sale of gold or the premium on gold as if it came from any other source? Is there any distinction between funds? Is there any magic about $20,000,000 received from one source rather than another when it is once covered into the Treasury? The moment it is there one thing is certain: if it is not demanded by the current expenses of the Government, if it is not an absolute necessity to devote it to paying current requisitions, the place where it should go in honesty, in bookkeeping, in legislation, and in fact, is to the payment of the interest-bearing debt, to the payment of that portion of the matured or redeemable debt, whatever it may be, upon which the largest interest is running. Is not that palpable to every Senator? And does it help the case at all for the Senator from Vermont to say that $20,000,000 of greenbacks, in place of extinguishing $20,000,000 of interest-bearing debt, are to be destroyed because these greenbacks have been received from selling gold rather than from the taxes paid by the people of the country, or from any other source? If destroying them was the whole transaction it might be said that the volume of paper currency was thereby reduced; but destroying them for the purpose, and as part of the transaction proposed, defeats this result.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It meets the objection about taxation.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator says it meets the objection about taxation. Does it? Let me turn to that. Is it true that if you take it out of one pocket and put it into another, you gain or lose anything? Is it true that if you take from the Treasury $20,000,000 derived from premium on gold and devote it to a certain purpose, and then take $20,000,000 from another place and devote that to the purpose for which the first $20,000,000 should have gone, you have saved anything in the operation? That may do on the stump; it may do to say to some people, "Oh, no; you are not taxed for this; we are going to do this after the fashion of the man who proposed to abolish taxes and pay all expenses out of the Treasury." That may do in certain places; but it will not do when put under the microscope and examined as it will be by men who understand, at least in a homely way, financial or business questions.

Now, let me come to the other suggestion made by my honorable friend. He appeals to me to know if I am not in favor of returning to specie payments. He knows I am, because for many summers and many winters he and I have voted and labored together in that direction. But he asks whether I expect to return to specie payments if all the greenback notes are kept afloat. No, sir, by no means; but the question is whether we are to inflate the currency of the country $20,000,000 on the one hand, and on the other at the same time annihilate a non-interest-bearing circulation of even amount, and then pretend that we are doing it with a view to curtail the currency, or to approach specie payments. That is the proposition. If any man can show me that by putting out bank bills for which the Government pays interest, and in the same breath retiring greenbacks to the same amount for which it pays no interest, we are reducing the volume of paper currency, or hastening the day when specie payments are to return, I should be glad to learn the arithmetic or the process by which that result may be arrived at. I do not understand it. It would be like my taking up a check of my own, dated ahead and bearing no interest, and replacing it with my note bearing interest, with a view to diminishing my liabilities!

Mr. President, this will not do. The Senate is brought to the defeat of this proposition to increase bank circulation, or else to an inflation of the currency to the amount proposed, or else to taking up $20,000,000 of inexpensive currency to the end that $20,000,000 may go out which bears an interest of nearly ten per cent.

These are the three alternatives. Now, sir, as matter of right, I have no doubt what should be done, if it can be accomplished. The localities and the banks which have received without law an excess of circulation, should be called upon to relinquish the small percentage asked for now by the localities who have not received their share. The banks enjoying more than their rights should be scaled down until a recall of currency has taken place sufficient to supply this demand. That has been proposed repeatedly. I understand from the Senator from Ohio that he on one occasion introduced a bill looking in that direction, which was dropped.

A bill was introduced in the other House, which I have before me, with a provision apparently well considered, which, if it were thought well to take it up, would enable us, no doubt, to reach a conclusion upon the theory I suggest. But not wishing to interfere with this bill, but merely to assign the reasons for the vote I shall give, I do not feel inclined to offer such an amendment or to make more than a suggestion on the point. I only say in passing that, as an original question, if we could get at it, all must agree that all parties should be put somewhat in status quo, they should be brought back toward where they were. As a simpler mode, this proposition is before us; but it involves the question whether we ought on the one hand to inflate the currency, or whether on the other, as an antidote to that, we ought to strike down the corresponding amount of non-interest-bearing circulation, to the end that we may substitute for it these $20,000,000, upon every penny of which interest is to be paid, either by a further issue of bonds, which would create a further interest account, or by annihilating greenbacks received in the collection of the revenue, which can be spared, and then by withholding those greenbacks from the cancellation of a corresponding amount of interest-bearing debt, and thus putting an end to them for the mere purpose of obliteration as the debit entry in the account of the circulation of the country. It seems to me we cannot avoid that conclusion; and, although I should be very glad to find an alternative corrective of the grievance complained of, I cannot vote either for the inflation or for the transmutation of $20,000,000 which bear no interest into $20,000,000 bearing oppressive and extravagant interest.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, there is one view only, and that I wish to present in connection with the views presented so very clearly by the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from New York in regard to this matter; a view that neither of them has taken, and that, when presented, I think presents the whole case. This bill does not seek to inflate the currency nor to diminish the currency; it does not propose to affect the currency question. The Senate has directed us substantially not to interfere with the currency, either by an increase or a diminution; but still there is one evil that must be rectified, which is so palpable that every man can see it. It is made a political question as well as a financial question. That is that the present circulation of the banks in this country is grossly and improperly distributed. I can give the reason for it, if necessary; it is owing to a misconception of the act. I agree with the Senator from New York that it grew out of a misconception of the act by the Comptroller of the Currency, but I do not wish to find any fault now. The fact exists; it is so palpable and so gross that every man can see it without knowing the difference between two and four. In some of the States they have seventy-seven dollars in circulation for each inhabitant; in others sixty dollars; in others fifty dollars; in others forty dollars; and in others thirty dollars; while in some of the States they have only twenty-five cents for each inhabitant.

The Senator from Vermont triumphantly says, "Why did not these States come forward and get their circulation when they could; New England did it, and New England therefore ought to retain what she has." The answer is palpable. Take the State of Missouri: Missouri was threatened by guerrillas, and no man of ordinary prudence would start a bank there at the time this banking circulation was absorbed; and the result was that Missouri, a powerful State with a large city within her limits, the city of St. Louis being larger now than any city in all New England, has no banking circulation of any account. That is so gross and palpable as to present a case where every Senator would say that State ought to have the benefit of this circulation if it is of any benefit whatever. So in regard to Kentucky: Kentucky was more or less threatened during the whole war; and although Louisville was never occupied by the rebels, it was so threatened that no prudent man would embark there in banking capital, which requires safety above all other pursuits. The result is that Kentucky has no circulation, and so of every rebel State. Your law was passed when it was not in the power of any one to start national banks in those States. They are without them. They are now being restored to their former places in the Union; they are about to have Senators and Representatives on these floors. They have cities; they have commerce; they furnish cotton; they furnish the basis of a large and profitable commerce and manufacturing operations. It is necessary to have currency to move their crops. Is it not right that they should have some? They have none now.

The inequality of the distribution of the banking circulation is so palpable that no Senator can overlook it. How shall that be corrected? If I wanted to make this a matter of sectional feeling I would say at once New England ought to give from her excess what is wanted. The Comptroller of the Currency says $20,000,000 will be sufficient to satisfy the reasonable demands for currency of these States, for a time at least, until the question can be treated in a broader and more statesmanlike view. He says that with fifteen or twenty million dollars he could satisfy all the reasonable demands of the southern States at present, and he asks us to authorize him to issue circulation to that amount to the South. But where shall we get it?

The amount limited by law, $300,000,000, is already reached. Shall we issue new circulation beyond $20,000,000. If so, we encounter the opposition of those opposed to any increase of circulation. Shall we take from those who, without authority of law, now possess more than their share by a misconception of the act as we claim? If we take the first proposition and increase by $20,000,000, how much is that? Only six per cent. of the present amount of bank circulation, or only three per cent. of the aggregate circulation of the country. It is therefore a very small amount. But the limit of $300,000,000 was fixed when in the midst of war, when in no one of the rebel States could you circulate a single dollar of your greenbacks or national bank notes. Since that limit was fixed our population has increased about fourteen per cent. according to the ratio of increase. We have added to our governed population over ten million people that had none of this circulation when you fixed the limit, and since that time our wealth has largely increased. Several of our western States have more than doubled since 1860 when the census was taken on the basis of which the apportionment was made.

Is it, therefore, unreasonable now, five years after this limit was fixed, to propose an increase of $20,000,000, which is only a trifling percentage of increase? We thought not. On the other hand, if we attempt to tamper with the banks already in existence, we incur a formidable opposition. I introduced a proposition some years ago to withdraw from Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts, a portion of their banking circulation. Their Senators very properly said: "We took this circulation at your request; we adopted your banking system; we surrendered our own; we did it in good faith; is it right or fair now for you to withdraw a portion of our circulation when we accepted your banking system?" My answer was: "Although you have your circulation, upon, I think, an erroneous construction of the law, yet your people did it in good faith and have based their operations upon it; therefore it would be hard, to say the least, to withdraw from these three States that have an excess of circulation, $20,000,000." These States have an excess of over twice their share of $60,000,000—$59,573,837—based upon population. If you allow these States twice their share on account of their wealth, their being old States, and having an old banking circulation, allowing them that to make them equal, then they have $60,000,000 more than their share. If there was a way by which $20,000,000 of this circulation could be withdrawn from them and given to the other States I should be very glad to do it; but, sir, I say it is impracticable.

Several bills have been introduced and referred to the Committee on Finance proposing this equalization of circulation, but none of them have been satisfactory. None of them could be adopted without doing injury to local interests that have accepted your banking system in good faith; and, therefore, as the lesser of two evils we propose to add $20,000,000 to the aggregate of circulation. Some Senators are disposed to exaggerate the evils of inflated paper money. Why, sir, our paper is far less inflated now than it was two or three years ago. We had at one time $450,000,000 of greenbacks at the same time when we had $300,000,000 of bank currency; and we had, besides, compound interest notes and various forms of floating indebtedness which now are all paid off. We have no circulation and nothing that enters into circulation except greenbacks, bank circulation, and three per cent. certificates, which can only be held by banks. So that that which forms the circulation of the country has been vastly diminished until a demand has come to us rather to increase than to diminish; and we dare not now in face of the popular opinion reduce the volume of our greenbacks or our national bank currency. We dare not, I say, in fair obedience to the popular will which governs Senates as well as everybody else.

Why, therefore, this persistent objection to a small increase of circulation which will only present local advantages and local facilities to communities that never had the benefit of the system at all, either of greenbacks or of banks. If you could issue $20,000,000 of greenbacks and distribute them over the South, that might be fair. It would give us $20,000,000 without interest; but you cannot do that. Greenbacks have no local habitation and no local name. But when you establish local banks in a community, say in the city of Mobile, you give to that city the local advantage of banking circulation, you give it the local advantage of banking capital, and the merchants have more or less of the benefits of that local circulation and local capital at the seasons when it is necessary to move the crops.

I say, then, that the conclusion to which the committee arrived, to give this little addition, to be distributed as far as may be among those States that have the least, I think is the fairest solution of this matter until the great question can be settled on a more comprehensive basis. So far as my constituents are concerned, this bill does not affect them at all. We have about our share of circulation. We have no cause to complain. We are perfectly satisfied with it. But the relief proposed by this bill will go to the States of the West and South that are now severely pressed by the results of the war and that need this little aid to support them on the revival of trade and commerce, and to give a little impetus to reviving industry.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Finance whether the first section of the bill, by correcting the abuse, which undoubtedly is an abuse, of using the reserve, will not have a tendency practically to produce contraction to some extent?

Mr. SHERMAN. That will not affect this question, because, as a matter of course, these banks will be chartered where there are no banks now.

Mr. STEWART. Will it not affect the aggregate amount of circulation?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all. The only question is whether the circulation shall be kept at home and lent at home, or whether it shall be sent to New York and lent at New York. The first section applies to a different state of facts entirely.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] seems to advocate a very desirable state of things, which is a return to specie payments at some day or other, and as early a day as possible; and at the same time he has pointed out certain difficulties which would follow from the course proposed by the committee, even with the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont. He has shown that by it we either do increase, or do not reduce, our interest account. It is certainly very desirable to reduce it if we can, and surely we ought not to increase by any means if we can avoid it. But I failed to perceive in his argument that he proposed any remedy whatever for what is said to be the difficulty that this proposed issue of $20,000,000 is designed to remedy. He left that question untouched.

The question before the Senate, as I understand it, is whether or not the condition of affairs in some of the States is such as absolutely to require an increase of their local circulation, and as that increase of the local circulation cannot be had under the present amount fixed by law, whether it is desirable to increase that amount to a certain extent? My friend from Vermont says it may be desirable to do it, but at the same time you must not increase at all the total circulation; that is already sufficiently inflated; and therefore he proposes that just in proportion as you increase the banking circulation you shall diminish and contract the national circulation proper; that is, United States notes. That idea undoubtedly has the germ in it of what I believe to be the correct principle and the solution of the whole difficulty. We wish to return to specie payments at as early a day as possible, for obvious reasons, which I will not stop to argue. The reasons address themselves to everybody's mind. It is quite apparent that you cannot do that so long as the national circulation remains as high as it is. That is out of the question. It therefore becomes desirable to reduce that circulation in order to accomplish that object; and that was the idea upon which Congress a short time ago proceeded.

There are men in the community who are very strict and very close who argue that $300,000,000 is circulation enough for the whole country. I do not believe that; but at the time when that limit was fixed for the national bank notes it is quite obvious it was as high as we ought to go, for the reason that it only made a part of the circulation, and was only to make a part of the circulation. We had at that time, and were to have, about $400,000,000 additional of Government currency; and it was not desirable that we should throw the whole system of banking open and let everybody bank as much as he pleased without fixing any limit and without adopting any system by which it could be brought down to and confined to a reasonable amount. Consequently, it was fixed at about three hundred million dollars. The idea was, or at least my idea was, that if that system was to remain permanent the amount must necessarily be increased in proportion to the increase of business of the country from time to time, either by increasing the limit or by throwing the whole matter open to anybody that wished to enter into it, which I believe might safely be done under a proper state of things. But that could not be done then; that is, it could not be done without dangerously inflating the currency, until you adopted a system by which you took the Government circulation out of existence; and it could not be done with a hope of returning to specie payments so long as you left this Government circulation in existence at the same time. It was evident it would not do to leave all that in existence which prevented our return to specie payments, and throw the whole matter open for everybody to have as much circulation as they chose to risk their capital upon, because there would be no end to it, and the circulation would be enormous, and the return to specie payments would be indefinitely postponed.

Now, sir, what was the system which Congress hinted at, and which, in my judgment, was a sound one? It was the gradual reduction of the national circulation down to a point when the Government could resume specie payments safely, and to so graduate it, although its termination and its course were to be perfectly evident, as to show those engaged in banking that they must set their houses in order and prepare themselves when the Government was prepared also to resume specie payments, for one must follow the other; not to do the thing suddenly, which might break the banks, or expose them to great difficulties, but to reduce gradually that which had grown gradually according to the necessities of the case and the ability of the country, so that you might finally come to a point where the Government liabilities were so reduced that the Government could resume, and the banks having due notice could also be prepared to resume at the same time.

It was for that purpose, with that leading idea, although the action taken did not go so far, perhaps, as I would have been willing to go at that time—that we adopted the rule that we would, in the first place, fix the amount that was to be reduced each year—$4,000,000 a month, I think it was; that was considered to be enough, as much as the country would bear at that time; but the idea was that it was to continue and be a gradual reduction, so as to gradually but surely bring the Government back to a condition where specie payments could be resumed, and having that time to look forward to that the banks would also be prepared to meet it in the same way, and capital would be so accumulated as to enable the country to do it safely.

Well, sir, what have we seen at this session? Forthwith there is an outcry, "You must stop reduction;" and not only stop reduction, but by a vote that was passed here in the Senate, "You must not intimate that you ever mean to reduce any more." You will not even say that the volume of United States notes shall not go back to the $400,000,000 where it started from, although we got it down to $360,000,000. Those were the notes of the Senate. The two cries were simultaneous; one was, "Stop the reduction" with reference to these greenbacks, the national circulation. Another was, "Reduce taxation so as to have no surplus in the Treasury to reduce with." We were having a presidential election coming off; candidates were advocating greenbacks ad libitum and other schemes like it; and the consequence was that Congress got frightened, and we cried, "Reduce taxes; stop reducing the amount of the greenbacks; stay just as we are;" and what is the consequence? It was passed. We refused to carry out the system, and here we are in precisely this difficulty at the present day.

If we had carried on our system and continued our reduction, we should not have been met with the difficulty that my friend from New York has stated in his speech to-day; and that is, it will not do to issue this $20,000,000, because you inflate the currency, unless you take in the greenbacks. We should have had the $20,000,000 in; we should have been in a condition, and we should have been getting gradually into a condition in the course of a year or two hence when we could have resumed specie payments, if necessary, and when we could have done the other thing that will then make itself obvious to the mind of everybody. You may either fix a much larger point or a point far beyond that to which you are now limited, $300,000,000, or you may, when you get back to specie payments and have taken the national circulation out of the way, just say to everybody, "Bank as much as you please; take out your charter; furnish the circulation." There is no danger in it if the thing is well secured, because business will regulate it. No man will bank unless he can make money by it. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] would not carry on banking if he did not know he was making something out of it; nor would anybody else. It will be regulated by the demands of the country for circulation, and with specie payments resumed, and the circulation itself well protected by a pledge of bonds, or anything else you may substitute for bonds of equal value and protect the country entirely, you might well say to anybody, "Take out your charters; let business regulate the matter."

The difficulty, therefore, Mr. President, in which we are at this moment comes from this: I foresaw, everybody foresaw, that the unequal distribution of the $300,000,000 of bank circulation would make trouble. It had made it before; and that trouble is constantly increasing as the southern States are coming in and calling for the use of circulation; and as other States which have not had their sufficient share are increasing in their business, they want more. It is necessary that they should have it; but you have closed it out of your power to give them more for the very reason of your legislation at this session, that you have stopped reducing the amount of national circulation, that you have not been taking in one side in order to prepare yourself to let out on the other side.

Now, sir, my general idea is that the whole solution of the problem is very simple. I have looked at this matter, studied it in my way, and read the schemes that have been sent to me and sent to every Senator in favor of this way, that way, and the other way to return to specie payments. They have been of all sorts and sizes and dimensions and characters; but there is not anything in any of them hardly. There is but one simple mode of proceeding, and that is, take in your national circulation to a point where you can redeem. If you take it in to $150,000,000 you can resume specie payments easily, I take it, because those $150,000,000 would be held by the banks; they would not trouble anybody. My friend on my right [Mr. CATTELL] could fix the amount much better than I could, but my own impression is that when you have got it down to $150,000,000 you may easily, so far as the Treasury is concerned, resume specie payments at that moment.

Mr. HENDERSON. You can do it when you get it down to $250,000,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I doubt whether you could do it at $250,000,000; but you certainly could at $150,000,000. The banks in the mean time could prepare themselves. They understand when a storm is coming. They see, when the policy of the Government is once fixed, what they have got to do. They understand managing their own affairs; and, fixing the time at a reasonable distance ahead they would unquestionably be ready to start with the Government in the resumption of specie payment.

But the fright about taxation, the cry for diminution of taxation, cutting it down to the lowest notch, and the cry also against any further reduction of the currency, of which we heard so much, have placed us precisely in the category where we find ourselves; and that is, we cannot meet the demands upon us for increased circulation from different sections of the country of local character, for the very reason that we have not put ourselves in a condition to do it without inflating the currency so much. That is the trouble; and undoubtedly my friend from New York is right when he says, suppose you do this thing that is proposed and adopt the amendment of my friend from Vermont, you just take $20,000,000 which you might appropriate to reducing the interest account. So you might if you had it; but that does not relieve us of this difficulty, and that is, that circulation is wanted in certain portions of the country which have not got any. That is the matter to be solved. That is the problem just now before the Senate for its consideration.

I merely rose to point out the failure in proper policy which, in my judgment, has led to this difficulty; but nevertheless, pointing that out, here we are. Shall we deny to these sections of the country that which they need so much, if they do need it; and on that point I am very much inclined to follow my friends on the Committee on Finance. When I was a member of the committee I liked very much to have people follow me, and therefore I am very much inclined to be a good soldier myself, unless I can see very good reasons for not being so. They think it is absolutely necessary. It undoubtedly involves a sacrifice to a certain extent, but that sacrifice it is necessary to make from the necessity of the case and from the course of our own legislation, from our own want of firmness, from our own want of system in not adhering to a correct principle when we had once adopted it, and being frightened by the cry out of doors with reference to it.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the honorable Senator allow me to make an inquiry of him?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir. I do not know that I can give an answer; but I have no objection to the question.

Mr. CONKLING. The honorable Senator stated that the amendment of the Senator from Vermont had in it the germ of the true idea, if I caught his expression, proposing to reduce greenbacks so called in proportion as national currency was issued. Now, I have here, and have been looking at it to see if I was right, a national bank bill upon which I see is printed the language of the act making it a legal tender for everything due from the United States and to the United States, in substance, except customs duties, and on the other side of the account, interest on the public debt. I wish now to inquire of the Senator whether, if we could exchange the whole greenback circulation, $445,000,000, or whatever it may be, for national bank circulation, so as to annihilate the one and substitute the other, we should thereby be any nearer specie payments than we are now, unless we were to violate the faith of the Government establishing the national banks; and whether, aside from there being the same volume of paper out, answering the same purpose, we should not simply be increasing our interest account for the whole amount? In other words, if he will be kind enough to explain how it is that the germ of the true idea appears in this amendment, that by putting out national bank bills as fast as we retire greenbacks we are thereby approximating specie payments?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I had explained it. There is a very great difference between the two. I want to get rid of this whole system of legal-tender notes. When you have taken them up, they are out of the way and no longer a legal tender, and a circulation replaces them which is not a legal tender to the same extent; at any rate which is of an entirely different character, protected in the way that it is by law. You substitute one for another. The Senator asks me how you can do that without increasing your interest account. You cannot if you borrow money to pay it; but if you will put your taxation at a rate that will give a surplus, there is no difficulty about it, because you have a surplus raised, and that is the only way you can do it.

The difficulty in this whole matter, in my judgment, is that financial men and speculators of all sorts, and even members of Congress, have been trying to find some way of getting rid of our difficulties besides paying our debts. There is no other way. We have got to pay them some how or other, and we can only pay them by raising money, and by raising money by taxation. I agree that I do not want the taxation to be enormous, and I do not want it done this year, or next year, or any particular year or number of years that you suggest; but be in the way of doing it, pay something each year, reduce your taxes to such a point as will meet the expenses of the Government and give you some surplus to apply to the payment of your debts. That is the only way; and the first application that I would make of that surplus would be to redeem this legal-tender currency so called. It is a nuisance, as I think all that currency issued by the Government is, so long as it prevents the Government from being able to pay every demand upon it in specie. That is the simple idea I have; and therefore I say I would substitute one for the other, for the reason that when you have got the demands upon the Government which are payable in specie out of the way to an amount that they can meet, then you get back to specie payments as a matter of course; there is no trouble about that, and the banks come with you if they manage their affairs rightly.

The honorable Senator from Ohio suggested one other idea, which I agree with in part, but not in the whole. He says the people outside have settled this question in making these demands, and we must echo their sentiments with regard to them. So we must so far as their sentiments are just and right; but you cannot tell how the people are upon these questions. A portion of them are one way; a portion of them another way; and a portion of them another way. The difficulty is, that each gentleman supposes that those he represents constitute the people, or the majority of them. They do not constitute the people; that is, the whole people. We must make a system for the country, and I believe there is no way in which we can satisfy the claims of the people upon us so well as by ourselves devising a proper remedy for these evils, even although at the time it may seem disagreeable to them, and following it strictly and straightly. If they do not like it at first, they will like it when it works well. If rightly devised it will work well. That is our duty; and I say again, we were upon the right track, in my judgment, when we were reducing the claims against the national Treasury, and approximating as fast as we could, consistently with the interests of the country, to what would be a correct normal condition of things, and that is what we ought to have continued to do, instead of being frightened out of it, in my judgment. Still, I know so little about these matters that I do not speak with any degree of confidence; and yet that is my idea, and for so much as it is worth I give it to the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, we are told that this is simply $20,000,000 that Senators propose to inflate the currency with, and that it is demanded by the necessity of equalizing the circulation and giving to certain western and southern States and Territories circulation which they need. I realize that necessity as strongly as anybody; but I do not agree with the Senator from Ohio that the responsibility of the great inequality that now exists is to be thrown upon the Comptroller of the Currency. From my reading of the law, the responsibility is with Congress, and not with the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. President, this bill is not simply a measure to increase the circulation $20,000,000; but it is the beginning of the future financial policy of this country. If passed, it is to be the entering wedge and the beginning of what will be the future financial policy of our country. If we give $20,000,000 for the purpose of equalizing circulation, we recognize the necessity and the importance of that; but can we stop there? Twenty million dollars will not begin to equalize it. Everybody knows that. I heard a Senator say on Friday that it would take over one hundred million dollars to do it; and what would $20,000,000 be to the States and Territories that are spoken of in the way of equalizing the currency? It will be but the beginning, and at the next session you must go on and on, until you do reach that equality of which we hear so much. Then, sir, it will not be simply the question of putting $20,000,000 additional currency in circulation, but it will be the question of putting $100,000,000, or more than that, in circulation, sooner or later, for this very purpose.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is for inflating the currency directly $20,000,000. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] is for taking up an equal amount of United States notes and canceling them, so as to keep the volume of the currency the same that it is now. There are difficulties either way. In the first place, if we take up an equal amount of United States notes, as I argued the other day, it must be done in one of two ways: either by taking the money that is paid into the Treasury in the way of revenue, getting your $20,000,000 of legal-tender notes in that way, or by selling bonds to that amount and getting them in that way, as the Secretary of the Treasury heretofore contracted. I take it for granted that the Senate is opposed to the increase of the bonded interest-bearing debt; that it is opposed to converting a debt that pays no interest into a debt that pays nine or ten per cent. interest in currency. I shall therefore dismiss, as not a thing likely to be done, the idea that we are to go to work, as seems to be argued by the Senator from Maine, and convert this non-interest-bearing debt into an interest-bearing debt. Then if we will not do that—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I beg the Senator's pardon; I advocated no such thing. Still, I do not know but that it might be wise in a certain case. My idea is to pay it off. I said we ought to pay off this non-interest-bearing debt, but we ought to pay it off out of moneys taken from the Treasury, raised by taxation. We ought not to increase our debt to do it; but still, as the Senator suggests that idea, I will say to him that it is very questionable in my mind whether we should not benefit the people by borrowing money to take it up; whether they would not save more than they would lose in that way if we can get to specie payments by it.

Mr. MORTON. Then the Senator's proposition is this: that the people of the country shall be taxed in the course of the next few years to the amount of between three and four hundred million dollars, the money to be drawn directly from the pockets of the people, and at a time when they ought not to be paying off any portion of the national debt for the purpose of paying off the non-interest-bearing part of our debt and leaving the bonded debt just what it is. That is the Senator's proposition roundly.

On the other hand, the Senator from Ohio seems to be in favor of inflation. He thinks we could bear a much larger amount of currency than we now have, and even then not get back to what we had a few years ago. I had hoped that the Senate had got past the time when it was necessary to argue the evils of the inflation of the currency—the general increase of speculation; the general diminution of productive industry and the resort to speculation instead. Does not every man know that the result of an inflation of the currency is to increase the price of everything that is bought and sold, first beginning with the price of personal property, then touching real estate, and then, perhaps, coming to labor?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It begins with labor.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator says it begins with labor. I submit that it is the experience of the world that the price of labor is the last thing that is inflated.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator does not understand me. I mean to say that labor is the first thing to suffer from inflation.

Mr. MORTON. With that understanding I agree. It is the first thing to suffer from inflation and the last thing to be improved by it. Sir, as soon as inflation takes place speculation begins; and what is the effect of it? Everything acquires two prices, the real price and the speculative price.

Mr. SHERMAN. If it will not interrupt my friend and make him cross his path, I should like to ask him a question. If inflation has such terrible evils, why does he not adopt the doctrine of the Senator from Maine and resume specie payments in that way?

Mr. MORTON. I do not cross my path. I think the Senator crosses his path, as I can very clearly show him. It is not a question whether you shall go one way or the other, but it is a question of stability. Every interest in this country demands stability and demands that we shall avoid fluctuation.

As I was remarking, Mr. President, when inflation begins property acquires two prices: the real, actual, demand price, and the speculative price. Men can put property into warehouses and hold it for a rise of prices, and thus, as we saw during the war and during this great inflation, the price of goods goes up fifty, one hundred and fifty, two hundred, and three hundred per cent., because of this speculative price brought about by the great abundance of money. But how is it with labor? You cannot put labor into a warehouse and hold it for future demand or speculation. The demand for labor is immediate, as labor is needed; and therefore, when inflation takes place, labor is the last thing to be inflated and the first thing to feel the evils of it. Mr. President, we have already suffered the evils of inflation. We have had one great inflation, and we have got part of the way down. It has cost the American people dearly in coming down. The down grade is marked at every step by bankruptcies and ruin in every part of this country. Would the Senator from Ohio have us make the ascent again, that we may have again the ruinous descent? I trust not.

If this system of increasing the national bank currency shall be adopted the country will not resort to inflation, but it will probably resort to the other system of taking up and canceling the United States notes.

Now, Mr. President, the most important thing for us to do, and the thing we ought to do before this Congress adjourns, is to take some steps toward the return to specie payments. Every other financial scheme is a nostrum as compared with that. It cannot be done, nor can it be done indirectly. It will not "turn up," as Micawber might suppose it would. It will not come around incidentally or indirectly by resorting to some other gentle, ineffective, meaningless measure. Sir, the way to return to specie payments is by taking some direct step in that direction. As the Senator from Maine said, the only way to pay a debt is to pay it; and I say the only way to return to specie payments is by taking some step in that direction; some step that looks toward it; some step that will give the country assurance that specie payments will be made.

Now, sir, how is it to be done? I do not know; I am not a financier; but as I believe in direct measures and not indirect, Machiavelian measures, the way to return to specie payments, in my judgment, is to fix some time when this Government will redeem its legal tender notes. Give everybody notice; let the people prepare for it; let the Government prepare for it by collecting its reserve of gold; let everybody get ready for it; and as the time approaches when you are to return to specie payments, the premium on gold will gradually go down, until as you get to that time it will have gone altogether; and then the legal-tender notes being as good as gold the people will not want the gold except for specific purposes.

Mr. President, it was a strange idea suggested by the Senator from Maine to-day, not for the first time, for I have heard it a number of times, and from other Senators on this floor—I believe the Senator from Vermont concurs in it—that by simply withdrawing the legal-tender notes you thereby return to specie payments. That all you have got to do is to get clear of these notes, either by burning them up, taking them from the revenue, or by canceling them, taking them from the proceeds of bonds sold, and as soon as you have done that, you have got to specie payments. Yes, Mr. President, you have got there then, but you have got there by a panic, by a crash. You have got there in the same way that you would get there if the Supreme Court were to decide to-morrow that the legal-tender notes were unconstitutional, and therefore there would be nothing a legal tender but gold and silver; but what would be the result? There would be a general falling of prices and values, the result of which would be an almost universal bankruptcy. No, sir; it is a mistaken notion to suppose that you have got to specie payments healthfully and safely by simply withdrawing legal-tender notes. You have got there then by necessity; but you have got there by universal bankruptcy and convulsion.

Why, Mr. President, your bonds are worth but seventy-four or seventy-five cents on the dollar in gold, if you count it in the way of discount. The whole country now is under a deception in regard to the value of legal-tender notes and national bank currency; and what is it? It is because the depreciation of these notes is measured, not by discount in the honest way, but is simply measured by the premium on gold, and therefore is kept out of sight of the people. The legal-tender note is par in contemplation of law. It is par because you can make your neighbor take it in payment of debts. If it is only worth six cents on the dollar in gold, still, in contemplation of law, it is par. The gold and silver are kept out of sight. Therefore you measure the depreciation of these notes not by discount but by the premium on gold. You sell your legal-tender notes at par and your bank notes at par; but if you look at gold it is forty per cent. premium. That is the way you measure the depreciation. But whenever you withdraw the legal-tender notes from circulation, then they cease to be par and gold becomes par, and you count the depreciation of your bonds and your national bank notes and everything by discount.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then you are back to specie payments.

Mr. MORTON. You are back to specie payments; but all the foundation of these banks is then twenty-five to forty per cent. below par. You count by discount then, and not by the premium on gold. Measuring the depreciation of these notes by the premium on gold is precisely like paying taxes under the form of a tariff. The people pay millions of taxes to the Government in the form of a tariff, because the duties are covered up in the general price of the article which they pay to the merchants, and do not reflect that one half of that price has been brought about by duties paid to the Government. The legal-tender note is now par in our contemplation. Gold is now out of view, and we think but little of the premium on gold; but the very moment you take away the legal tenders, then it becomes discount and everybody sees it. We do not want an increase of national bank notes, indefinitely or to a large sum, when we know they are only worth seventy cents on the dollar. That is all your national bank note is worth to-day; and we do not even get that much for it, because where the price of commodities is regulated by a depreciated currency that is a legal tender you never do get what is, in point of fact, the actual value of your currency, and especially in dealing in real estate. Now, sir, the moment your legal-tender note is gone, the moment it has been withdrawn in accordance with the suggestion of the Senators from Maine and Vermont, then the depreciation in the national bank note remains just what it is to-day.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask my friend a question. If the legal-tender notes were out of the way he says the depreciation would still continue as to bank notes, if I understood him.

Mr. MORTON. I say you do nothing to prevent that continuing as to them.

Mr. SHERMAN. On the contrary, any holder of a bank note might present it to the bank and demand gold, and as a matter of course it would have to be paid in gold, or else it would be brought here and the bank would be exploded at once.

Mr. MORTON. I was just coming to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator wants to get back to specie payments, it can only be the retirement of the greenbacks that will bring us there.

Mr. MORTON. Not at all; not their retirement in that way, as I shall show you after a while.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator can show us how to retire the greenbacks, except by paying them, I should like to hear it.

Mr. MORTON. That is just what I propose; to return to specie payments by doing what the Government promises to do, and that is, by paying these greenbacks in gold. Now, I wish to ask the Senator a question, because it shows the weakness of the question he asked me. He says if you take away the greenbacks the holder of the national bank note can present it to the bank for payment. The bank has got no notes to redeem in; according to the original constitution of the bank it must pay in gold; but, I ask you, where is the bank that can redeem its issues in gold when that bank is predicated upon bonds that are only worth seventy or seventy-four cents on the dollar, when the whole constitution of the bank is thirty per cent. below par? No bank can do it. It is idle to suppose because you take away the greenback circulation and require the bank to pay in gold that you thereby bring up the value of the stocks of that bank and its outstanding notes thirty per cent., so as to make it par in gold. You do not do it. That is the fallacy the Senator from Maine is laboring under—that because you take away greenbacks and require the banks to redeem in gold you thereby give a gold value to their stocks and to their bills, which are to-day thirty per cent. below par, gold being at par. Sir, you cannot return to specie payments in any such way as that, I respectfully submit. We did not depart from it in that way, and we cannot get back to it in that way. We must get to it through the same medium by which we left it; and that must be by beginning the work of honestly redeeming these legal-tender notes in gold.

Why, sir, this system that I have advocated here seems to be predicated on the idea that it is a mere operation of law by which you are to return to specie payments; that Congress can resolve that the banks shall redeem after a certain period, and they will redeem. Sir, that is preposterous. Congress can create no power in the banks to redeem in gold and silver. Their very financial constitution to-day is thirty per cent. below gold in value. You may strike out the legal-tender notes; you may take any course you please, and you cannot restore the difference between their actual value and their gold value. We count their notes at par to-day, because gold is at forty per cent. premium; but when we take away the legal-tender notes, then we will measure their depreciation by discount, and that will bring them down to seventy cents on the dollar.

Mr. President, in my judgment it is the first business of the Government to take some steps toward a return to specie payments; and as I said before, and I wish to reiterate that statement, it is not to be done by wishing it; it is not to be done simply by some indirect and imperfect remedy; but it is to be done by some legislation looking directly toward it and making provision for it. If it were left to me I would fix a day in the future, and I would say that on and after that day the Government would redeem the legal-tender notes in gold, and thus comply with the promise made on their face. They are to-day over due paper that is dishonored by the maker. We cannot keep these notes up by the mere solvency of the maker. The solvency of the maker never kept over due paper at par, and never will. They have the additional value of being legal tenders, which the bank notes will not have when they stand alone. They are receivable for certain taxes; but all these things have failed to keep them at par, and they are worth but seventy cents on the dollar to-day.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask him why he would fix a day to redeem greenbacks in gold at par, when he can commence redeeming them now at seventy cents on the dollar?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, Mr. President, we can go out and buy them at seventy cents; but I ask how it would build up the credit of this nation if it were to go out and buy its own paper in the market, like a broker, at seventy cents on the dollar, when it refuses payment at the Treasury Department, which says that they shall have a dollar for every dollar promised upon the face of that bill? Sir, that would dishonor the credit of the nation.

Mr. HENDERSON. Let me ask the Senator, then, whether it is any less dishonorable to sell gold, which is the only constitutional currency, as I understand, according to his idea, at a premium?

Mr. MORTON. The cases are entirely different; but I am free to say that I have never approved of the policy of selling gold in the market, instead of reserving that gold until we can redeem our greenbacks.

Mr. HENDERSON. Congress passed a law authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to do it.

Mr. MORTON. To sell gold?

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I never voted for it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think you did.

Mr. MORTON. I think not; I was not here. There were a great many sins committed by Congress that I am not responsible for, although I have no doubt in the course of time I shall have my share.

Now, Mr. President, suppose we fix a time—

I will suggest now, simply by way of illustration, the 1st day of July, 1871—and declare that upon that day the Government will begin to redeem her paper. I will not say that she shall carry on all her operations in gold; but that upon that day she will redeem in gold the legal-tender notes presented at the Treasury Department, or at a place fixed for that purpose. What is the effect of it? To-day the Government gives no assurance that the legal-tender notes will ever be redeemed. To-day the Government pays no interest on that paper, and does not say whether she will ever pay the paper or not. We have only the vague hope and expectation that she will. But when we fix a time at which we will redeem that paper then every man can take his slate and pencil and set down what his legal-tender note is worth to-day, and as the time passes on and the period of redemption approaches the premium on gold disappears in the ordinary way. At the end of the first year, it will not be more than fifteen or sixteen per cent.; at the end of the next year, seven or eight; and as you come to the actual time of redemption the premium on gold fades away before you reach it; and then the people do not want the gold except for specific purposes.

I do not believe that more than $150,000,000 of gold would be required to begin and to carry on the work of redemption. The idea that a great many have that we must have as much gold on hand as we have greenbacks is entirely fallacious. There is no foundation for that opinion. Why, sir, it is a matter of experience all over this country, and, in fact, in Europe, that banks that have one dollar of coin in their vaults for every three dollars in circulation can carry on and do business safely. I am told that no bank has ever failed in this country that had that proportion of coin in its vaults; that upon examination the banks that have failed have not had more than one fifth or one sixth or one seventh the amount of coin in their vaults to their paper in circulation. I have seen a statement from a very able writer saying that no bank has ever failed in this country that kept a proportion of coin in its vaults of one dollar to three.

Now, Mr. President, to take an illustration: in the crash of 1837 the State Bank of Indiana suspended. The Legislature of the State met and gave it five years within which to resume. At the end of three years its notes were as good as gold; and when the five years expired the people had forgotten the time, and there was very little demand made upon the bank for gold. Such instances are numerous in the bank history of this country and of England and Scotland; and such would be the condition in this case if we were to fix a time when we would resume specie payments or redeem these notes in gold. By the time we reached that period, or before, the premium on gold would have run out, and there would be comparatively but a small demand upon the Government for gold. Why? Because, in the first place, of the confidence in the Government; in the second place, these legal-tender notes would be more convenient and desirable to the people in every respect except where they required the gold for specific purposes, than the gold itself. And, sir, I make another statement, which I ask some of the eminent financiers around me who seem to understand all about this question to bear in mind: there would be less gold required in general circulation in this country than there was before the war when we had a system of local specie-paying banks? Why? Because the bills of the State Bank of Indiana in 1860—as good a bank as there was in the United States—would not pay my hotel bill at the city of New York or Washington. They were of a local character, and if I traveled East I must supply myself with gold or the bills of eastern banks. That created a demand for gold; and what was true of the banks of Indiana was true of the banks of Kentucky and Tennessee, and of every other western and southern State. That created a demand for gold that would not exist now. Why, sir, the Indiana merchant in paying for his goods in New York was compelled to buy his exchange on New York at from one and one third to three and sometimes five per cent., to pay his debts in the East; and this created a constant demand for gold; and yet the banks paid specie. When the legal-tender note comes to be as good as gold the merchant can carry $10,000 of them about his person without show and without inconvenience in going to New York; or he can send them to New York by express for a very small sum, and he will have no occasion to buy gold; whereas before the war, and under a system of local specie-paying banks, he had to buy gold for that purpose, or buy exchanges, which was the same thing.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He proposes to fix a time ahead when we shall redeem these greenbacks in gold; resume specie payments, in other words, because we shall then have to pay them. I want to ask the Senator where he proposes to get the gold to do it with?

Mr. MORTON. I propose to get gold from the same source that we have been getting it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is taxation, is it not?

Mr. MORTON. That is from duties on imports, is it not?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Does the Senator suppose that we are to import such an amount that we can get gold enough from duties to meet all our interest that we are obliged to pay in gold at the present time, and at the same time have $350,000,000, more or less, to pay off these notes?

Mr. MORTON. I did not talk about $350,000,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. More or less, as much as may be necessary.

Mr. MORTON. I endeavored to encounter the fallacy awhile ago that we were required to have as much gold on hand as we had greenbacks out in order to resume specie payments. That was never necessary in regard to banks; and why should it be in regard to the Government, which has better credit than any bank ever had? Sir, that is not necessary. As I said before, you can begin to redeem safely when you have one half or less than one half of the amount in the Treasury that you have greenbacks out.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Now, I will ask the Senator whether it is not a similar process to retire the greenbacks immediately in small amounts, as they are taken into the Treasury, provided you have a surplus? because you have got to have a surplus anyhow to do it.

Mr. MORTON. One question at a time. I will answer that question after awhile if you will remind me of it. I think the Senator's question a moment ago was where we would get the gold. By reserving it in the Treasury, and not selling it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If we reserve it, how are we to pay our debts in the meantime?

Mr. MORTON. Well, sir, we have been paying our gold interest, and still there has been enough gold sold, we are told, to give us premiums to the amount of $20,000,000. Sir, if that gold had not been sold, but had been reserved in the Treasury, we would have gold enough in the Treasury to-day to begin the work of redemption now.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me answer that matter now.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to finish what few scattering remarks I have to make.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will simply say that up to within the last six months a very large portion of our interest was payable in paper money, and therefore a great deal of gold was sold; but on the 1st of July next the whole of our interest will be payable in gold, and we shall have no considerable sums of gold to sell. We certainly cannot have over twenty-five or thirty millions at the outside each year to sell.

Mr. MORTON. We shall have gold in the future as we have had it in the past. There is no question about that. The Government can procure the gold without trouble. Let me suggest, in this connection, how are the banks to resume specie payments unless the Government does it? If the Government does not do it, but throws the responsibility on the banks, they will have to buy the gold. I have endeavored to show that the banks cannot buy the gold. When the very constitution of the banks is thirty per cent. below par they cannot do it, and their paper will come to a discount and a ruinous discount if you throw the responsibility on them. We shall have gold in the Treasury. By reserving it for three years from this time, with what we have on hand now, we shall have enough to begin the work of redemption.

Now, sir, I want to say to the Senator from Maine and my friends about me, who seem to be exceedingly amused, for of course they know all about it and I know I do not, that when we have approached nearly the time of returning to specie payments, and when the premium on gold in this country is no more than ten per cent. or five per cent. we can then, if we should need gold to the extent of thirty or forty or fifty millions, raise it upon our fifty-two bonds at par. Instead of converting greenbacks worth seventy cents into gold-bearing bonds we can then in London raise as much gold as we want on our bonds at par, which are now selling at only seventy cents on the dollar in gold, and if there should be a deficit in gold any small amount could be readily supplied at that time.

Mr. CORBETT. I ask the Senator from Indiana whether, if the Government should first return to specie payments, the bond would not then be at par in gold? Consequently the bonds held by the banks for the redemption of their circulation would be at par also. The natural result follows. The Government must first return to specie payments, and then the banks can return to specie payment, because their bonds will have advanced to par in gold.

Mr. MORTON. My friend is right in the main body of his question. Mr. President, I am going to answer that question indirectly, but I think I shall answer it satisfactorily. I lay down this proposition, that the credit of a country never can get above the value of the circulating medium in which the business of that country is done if that circulating medium is the legal tender.

Now, what is the fact in regard to our bonds? They have followed the value of gold, and it was so clear through the whole war. Your fifties sold at par in legal tenders when gold was worth only 106 and at par in legal tenders when gold was worth 232. The proposition held true in regard to everything. It holds true in regard to State stocks, with one or two exceptions; it holds true in regard to railroad stocks; that is, that the general circulation of the country controls the credit of the country, and you cannot get above it. Railroad stocks that were at par in New York before the war in gold are simply at par in legal-tender notes worth only seventy cents on the dollar. What is the reason of it? Because you cannot get above that currency in which all the business of this great country, amounting to $30,000,000,000 a year, is transacted. Your State stocks that were at par before the war, as a general thing, in gold, although they are certainly as good now as they were then, and your railroad stocks, which, on the average, are forty per cent. better in point of average value because their debts have been paid off, are now at par in legal-tender notes worth seventy cents on the dollar, whereas before the war they were at par in gold. They follow the inevitable law that our own Government bonds followed through the war. They are governed by the value of that great currency in which the business of the country is done.

Mr. President, if this be true, it shows that the place to begin with is the circulating medium, and to make that as good as gold. You may talk about getting your bonds up to par in Europe; but to talk about getting your fifties to par when your legal-tender notes are not worth but seventy cents on the dollar is an absurdity. The business of the country is done on the basis of that circulating medium, and every credit goes down or goes up to it.

Now, Mr. President, one word in regard to inflation. I would not disturb the currency as it stands. I am glad that we stopped contraction. It was going on until it had become almost ruinous. I am not in favor of inflation; but I would continue the present state of things as nearly as possible. I believe that stability is necessary now to prosperity in this country. We must have peace in our currency as well as peace from arms. We must have stability, and then let industry and development and growth do the rest.

Now, we have, in my judgment, currency enough. Business men, however, can understand that better than I can; and I would have the work of future contraction to go on at the same time with and as a part of the work of redemption. If, however, the business men of the country should be of the opinion generally that more currency was required by the demands of business, it should be increased accordingly; for inflation does not begin until after that point has been passed; but I do not understand such to be their opinion. Let me suppose that we shall agree that we shall redeem on the 1st day of July, 1871. We have given time for reconstruction; we have given time for a recurrence of good crops; we have given time for the development of industry everywhere and general returning prosperity. On the day that we begin to redeem our legal-tender notes, on that day we add from two hundred and fifty to three hundred and fifty millions to the currency; we inflate it to that amount. How? All the gold and silver on that very day become a part of the volume of the currency. We inflate to that extent; but it is a legitimate inflation. Gold and silver now are not a part of the currency any more than horses and cattle are; they are simply commodities; but the very day we begin to redeem our legal-tender notes they become a part of the great volume of the currency, and we inflate to that amount, but we contract at the same time as these legal-tender notes are brought in and destroyed, so that the work of inflation and the work of contraction go together. Therefore there will be then no convulsion, there will be then no shock, it will all be done quietly; it will be done almost imperceptibly. The people will scarcely be aware of the process by which the legal-tender notes become as good as gold; and instead of having that universal rush to the Treasury for gold that some people have talked about, whenever we begin the work of redemption, as I said before, there will be no more demand for gold than there was before the war, and not nearly as much, because our bank paper at that time was local in its character and would not pay debts in distant parts of the country.

Then, Mr. President, let us go on as evenly as we can, but let us give this nation assurance that at some time the Government will redeem these promises. Let us give the nation assurance that on the 1st of July, 1871, or the 1st of January, 1871, or at some other time that may be agreed upon by Congress, we shall then begin the work of redemption. I want a gradual process; I want no shock; I want no panic, no convulsion; I do not want, by simply taking away legal-tender notes, to bring down the value and price of everything suddenly to the specie level. There is no necessity for that; and how will the country be benefited by that process? We withdraw from specie payments by the medium of legal-tender notes; we must return by the same road. We cannot return by the channel of national bank notes. The banks can never perform that office for us; it must be done by the Government, and it must be done simply by an honest performance of our promises to pay. It is not a mysterious, involved, intricate system of finance that I would recommend; I am incapable of conceiving such a plan; but it is the straightforward, direct performance of what we promised to do; and as we cannot perform that duty, and the whole world knows it, let us fix the earliest time when we can do it; let us assure those who hold our paper that on a certain day we will redeem that paper; let them prepare for it; let the Government prepare for it; let the whole world get ready for it; and it will come easily; it will come without a jar; it will come without trouble to the country.

Now, Mr. President, I will answer the concluding part of the question of the Senator from Oregon in regard to redemption by the national banks. Referring to the promises I have pointed out, the national banks then come to redeem with perfect ease, because the same process that enables the Government to do it brings to them the ability to do it; and the ability to pay in specie by the banks and by everybody returns by this imperceptible, it may be somewhat protracted course, that I have pointed out by which the general currency of the country, the standard currency by which all values are now measured, becomes equal to gold. At present the legal-tender notes are not the standard of value; they are only the standard of prices. Gold is as much the standard of value to-day as it ever was. I can take $7,000 in gold and buy as much property with it as I can with $10,000 in legal-tender notes. The increased price paid by the notes simply indicates the measure of depreciation. Gold is the standard of value, and paper is the standard of price; but when gold and greenbacks approach each other and become of the same value the greenback becomes equally the standard of value as does gold; they are convertible; and then we shall have such currency as will afford relief to the whole country without that convulsion of which so many have stood in dread. As legal-tender notes become the standard of value as well as the standard of price the holders of those notes are benefited along with the whole country far more than by the inflation of the currency, as the Senator from Ohio would indicate. That does not benefit anybody but the speculators. If I have $10,000 in legal-tender notes to-day, they are worth only $7,000 in gold; treating it as discount and not as premium, they are simply worth seventy cents on the dollar, which is a discount of thirty per cent. By the process I indicate these notes gradually appreciate in value until they become equal to $10,000 in gold, which their face calls for. I am just as much benefited as if the Government had issued an additional $3,000 to me gratuitously, and kept those notes at their present value, and in fact more, because from being worth only $7,000 in gold they are worth $10,000.

A great many people have the idea that you can make money plenty by simply issuing it in large quantities, and a great many think it ought then to be distributed per capita or in some other way by which everybody should have some. A gradual appreciation of the legal-tender notes, a gradual return to their original value being as good as gold, the redemption of them, it seems to me, solves the whole financial problem. What becomes, then, of your question about paying the bonds in greenbacks or in gold? As soon as the legal-tender notes become as good as gold, that question is gone; that thing which troubles politicians so much disappears and a thousand other questions go along with it. There are so many benefits to result from this process that it seems to me it ought to be the first thing to be looked to by the Congress of the United States. But, sir, here is a bill that I must say looks to me like a dodge. It does not furnish enough relief to the southern States to amount to much, but it is an excuse for not doing anything toward the main thing which ought to be attended to, which would do more to give confidence and restore the value of our currency than anything else, and that is to take some direct step, to give some direct assurance that this Government will at a certain time redeem its legal-tender notes in gold.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana has given us a great deal of sound doctrine. I agree with him fully in his statement of the good consequences that would result from returning to specie payments. I do not see but that his whole argument as to the mode comes to the same result that mine does. I propose to return to specie payments at an indefinite period in the future, as soon as it can be done without derangement of the business of the country by attempting to do too much. The Senator says, no, that will make a very great trouble; and he proposes to fix a time ahead, say 1871, and say that at that time we will return to specie payments. I shall be glad if we can get back to them by that period. But now I want to ask him how he proposes to do it. He says save your gold. Well, how are you to save your gold? By procuring something else in which to pay your debts as they accrue, support the Government, pay your interest, pay all demands. That is the only way you can do it. How are you to procure that? Is there any royal road to it? I know of no other way than by taxation. Your money is raised in that way, either through customs indirectly, or by direct taxation in the form of internal revenue. In order to accomplish this purpose of resuming specie payments in 1871 the Senator must be able to pay all the expenses of this Government of all kinds, and to lay up a surplus to meet that contingency. Is there any other mode? I know of none other.

Now, what is my proposition? I propose to return to specie payments, say in 1871, and how do I propose to do it? By retiring our notes gradually, say $4,000,000 a month, if you please. But how am I to do that? In no way but by taxation, getting enough surplus revenue to enable me to do it without increasing the debt of the country, for neither of us proposes to do that.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to point out the distinction?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. Redeeming at the end of a certain time, say July, 1871, and going on to retire these notes at the rate of $4,000,000 a month, makes all the difference in the world. Why? We tried it at the rate of $4,000,000 a month, and it was simply a reduction of the whole volume of currency. We retired at the rate of $4,000,000 a month, and we did not thereby add any gold or silver to the currency. Gold and silver were still commodities. But when you come to the work of not retiring your circulation by buying it up or destroying it in the way pointed out, but redeeming it on a fixed day, on that very day you add all the gold and silver in the land to the whole volume of currency; they become part of the currency of the nation, and instead of a contraction there is actually an inflation, and a large inflation, which is only to be counteracted by the contraction growing out of the notes you redeem and take out of circulation. But while the process goes on of retiring $4,000,000 a month, and before the time when you redeem, the gold and silver are no more a part of the currency of the country than they are to-day, and they never can be until the Government actually does what it said it would do, redeem its legal-tender notes in gold.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator's ideas are incomprehensible to me. I do not know that the currency is to be made currency of gold and silver by the Government's laying up gold and putting it into circulation in large quantities. That must be a gradual process which takes place consequent upon the withdrawal of paper. When a certain kind of currency is withdrawn which takes the place of gold and silver, gold and silver replace it by the natural course of business; and as you go on withdrawing from the volume of the currency so much paper, the idea is that gold and silver, in the course of the business of the country flow in naturally to supply the vacancy thus created; whereas the Senator's financial scheme is to let the Government run in debt, to expend all its energies in laying up in the Treasury immense amounts of gold and silver to take up all this paper at once. There is the difference between his system and mine.

As I said before, you must found them both upon the same idea, and that is upon the idea of taxation. You must have a surplus revenue, unless you run in debt constantly, in order to accomplish this purpose. If you do not propose to increase your debt you must have a surplus revenue. What does the Senator propose to do with it? Turn it into gold and put it into the Treasury and keep it there. What do I propose to do with it? Take your paper up regularly, gradually. Does the Senator imagine that the business of this country is not to be more disturbed by one great sweeping operation, a change at one moment, substituting immense quantities of gold for paper, than by doing it gradually from year to year and month to month?

Mr. MORTON. I desire to ask the Senator a question, with his permission.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator proposes, instead of disposing of the gold that day, to take up the paper gradually. Will he take it up at its face or buy it up in the market; and if he buys it up in the market, I want to know how much credit that gives to the Government, when it buys up its own paper at a discount, instead of redeeming it?

Mr. FESSENDEN. We do not propose any such thing. The Senator is running after shadows, he will permit me to say. The greenbacks flow into the national Treasury from year to year, and from month to month. If there is more than we have occasion to pay out, all we have to do is to cancel them, and there is an end of them, and we retire them just as we put them out, in the same way.

Mr. MORTON. And selling gold?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Selling gold if necessary to meet anything. If we have more gold than we have occasion to use, and we can afford to contract faster than the limit fixed, we may use it in that way if we please; but the Senator was for stopping that course. However correct his doctrine may be, however sound the doctrine he may lay down, when he comes to act he says, "Stop contraction; keep everything as it is now; let the currency be expanded; let prices be high; let everything be irregular; have nothing fixed, nothing stable; have no system from now till 1871 or 1875, as the case may be; let the country suffer under all these evils, from want of a system, and from the want of perceiving that we have any."

Suppose the Senator's plan is carried out, and the Government says to-day that in 1871 it will redeem its notes, do you suppose the people will not be looking to see whether you will be able to redeem in 1871? Unless they prepare for it, and prepare for it precisely in the way I suggest, by taxation and having a surplus revenue to meet it, when that time comes they will be just as badly off as they are to-day, no nearer to redemption in 1871 than they are now in 1868. The thing is not to be done by an act of Congress, unless that act of Congress points to some regular mode of accomplishing the purpose. As I stated before, there is only one way, and that is to get the money over and above what you use for necessary expenses of the Government, and appropriate it to that purpose. The Senator has abandoned the idea of a gradual approach to it, and says he will have nothing gradual; that all shall be done upon one and the same day, and by an act of Congress. If that is the course adopted, and he does nothing toward preparing for it, when that day comes he will be as badly off as he is to-day; he will be in precisely the same condition, and the country will be as badly off as it is to-day.

Sir, it cannot be accomplished in that way. The Senator says you cannot do anything by obliging the banks to redeem, or putting the responsibility upon the banks. Who talks of putting it upon the banks? Nobody. I say that when the Government pays in specie, the banks must pay in specie then, or within a short time afterward, because what they hold as reserve will then be equivalent to specie. At present, so long as there are greenbacks enough, greenbacks take the place of specie in the banks; but when they are withdrawn, the banks must redeem in gold or wind up. That is a necessity that follows. I would give them time to prepare for it, give them notice, have it gradual, let everybody understand what is to come and be approaching it; not fix some definite period in the future when we must return to a most halcyon state and yet do nothing to accomplish it. Sir, you cannot do it in that way.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. President, to me, as a business man, it seems very plain that if I was doing a business of $100,000,000 a year, and I should put out my paper bearing no interest, commonly called "shipplasters," and say to my workmen "take these at par," and they should go with those notes to purchase flour and should find that for a barrel of flour which they could purchase for ten dollars in gold they had to pay fourteen dollars in my shipplasters, I should have to pay them forty per cent. more for their labor than I should if gold were my currency, because they would require that much more to enable them to live. A man who is doing business of $100,000,000 a year in that way must necessarily pay $140,000,000 for what he would have to pay $100,000,000 for if he was operating upon a gold basis. If he went and borrowed that $100,000,000 for that year what would he pay? He would pay six per cent. per annum—$6,000,000. But he is a coward, and he says, "I will not increase my debt $100,000,000; I will not make myself liable for that; but I will give my due bills, which bear no interest, and which are at a discount of forty per cent.; I will pay those out to my employes, and consequently everything they produce for me will cost me just forty per cent. more than it would if I borrowed the $100,000,000 and paid interest on that and paid them in gold directly." So we hesitate, are afraid to borrow one or two hundred million dollars, which would enable us to return to specie payments. What would be the result if we borrowed one of two hundred million dollars? We should pay simply the interest upon that sum, whereas we are now constantly paying forty per cent. on everything.

If we export $100,000,000 of our bonds this year we sell what we ought to get $100,000,000 for for about $70,000,000, and we consequently lose $30,000,000 on that operation; whereas if we paid $6,000,000 interest we should save this immense depreciation; we should place ourselves upon a cash basis, and we should simply be paying the interest for the time being and would bring everything to a gold standard. Consequently we should be enabled to ship more products out of the country at a gold standard than we should if gold were at forty per cent. premium, because no man is going to sell what cost him $1,400,000 for $1,000,000 and send it to Europe trusting to get $1,500,000. He says, "I do not know whether I shall get the extra $400,000 or not when my return comes from Europe in the shape of goods; I may not be able to get more than $1,300,000; a change in the relative value of gold and paper in the mean time may cause me to lose $100,000."

The only solution to this problem is that we have either got to tax the people sufficiently to reduce the volume of legal tenders to a hundred and fifty or two hundred and fifty million dollars; so that we can give notice that on a given day, as my friend from Indiana says, we shall resume specie payments and prepare for that day, or we must take up gradually our notes and let capitalists and the people see that we are taking them in. When they see gold increasing in the Treasury and currency diminishing, they will say, "The Government intends to resume specie payments; she is decreasing her currency, and increasing her gold." Continue this course, and you will soon have money on hand with which to pay your greenbacks dollar for dollar, and the result will be that you will have very little demand for your gold. Then in a few years, confidence being once more restored, the banks will take the same position; the Government stocks will be worth dollar for dollar in gold, because you will have returned to specie payments; the banks holding Government stocks to secure the circulation of their notes will be worth dollar for dollar in gold. When the people see that if they present their currency for redemption they can get gold, when they know that bank notes are secured by gold-bearing stocks on which they can get gold any day, they will not be in any hurry to present their notes. So it has been, and will be again. In that way the banks can return to specie payments as well as the Government.

That looks to me to be the only sensible way in which we can accomplish it. But we say we will not tax the people $6,000,000 a year to save $30,000,000 a year to the Government and to our people. If we save these $30,000,000 in our exchanges, would not that amount be in circulation among the people? I say that it would. If you pay to Frankfort $6,000,000 interest you get in return $100,000,000 in gold, which would enable you to return to specie payments; and then whatever you send out of the country you send out at par, at the gold value, and the consequence would be that you would be enabled to export more out of the country besides getting dollar for dollar for your bonds, and in that way you would return to specie payments, and you never will return to specie payments until you tax the people sufficient to retire the legal tenders to a sufficient point to enable you to say to everybody, "Bring on your legal tenders and we will pay you dollar for dollar; we have the gold to meet them." When people find that you have the gold to pay them with they will not want it. You must bring the legal tenders down to that point that you show your ability to redeem them, and then you will be on a specie basis; and until that time arrives, if you do not tax the people, if you are not willing to tax them, you will never reach it. I am free to say that I would rather pay $6,000,000 a year interest than lose $30,000,000 in the exportation of our bonds to pay the balance of trade against us. That is the simple result of the whole plan. We shall not improve our position if we are not willing or brave enough to stand up and say that we will tax the people $6,000,000, but that we will constantly go on, like a man who is doing a losing business all the time and has not the pluck to say I will borrow $100,000,000 with which to pay my debts; I will put myself on a gold basis, and I will pay everybody in gold instead of paying the $140,000,000 which it would cost me if I do not borrow the $100,000,000." As long as you continue in this position when you have forty per cent. per annum on gold, everything being based on that, no one will send products out of the country instead of gold; the only things that go abroad are gold and United States bonds, and the products of the country are kept at home and eaten up. If a man has a surplus he is not going to sell what cost him $140,000 for $100,000 and send it out of the country; he will hold it until next year, and then if he cannot sell it he will eat it up; and you do eat it up, you consume it within yourselves, you do not ship it out of the country. That is the consequence of the present state of things.

It seems to me, and it has seemed to me for a long time, that if you borrow enough money to place yourselves on a specie basis you save a great deal in the end. In this way you can get sufficient gold in the Treasury to pay a large amount of the legal tenders and bring the volume of them within easy reach. When you do that, the banks will resume specie payments. Look at the condition of the banks to-day; look at the banks of the city of New York; take the Bank of Commerce, the Bank of New York, the American Exchange Bank, the leading banks there, most of the responsible banks have a surplus to-day of forty per cent. Why do they keep that surplus of forty per cent.? Why do they not divide it among their stockholders? For the reason that they expect you to take steps toward specie payments, and when you do they know that they must prepare themselves to pay in specie, and they are looking ahead to the possibility of having to place themselves on a gold basis. The small banks, the banks in the interior, probably have not this surplus; but I tell you all far-seeing men, all far-seeing banking institutions, desire to return to a specie basis, and all who have the good of the country at heart are preparing to put themselves on a specie basis whenever the proper time arrives. It is only necessary for the Government to take a step toward putting itself on a specie basis, and the banks will do the same.

I do not agree with my friend from Indiana that by merely fixing a time, without taking any other step such as I have indicated, we shall secure a return to specie payments. The banks have a capital of $400,000,000; they are required to keep in their vaults twenty per cent. in legal tenders or gold. They have not got gold because you do not make it necessary for them to keep gold; and the consequence is they have $80,000,000 in legal tenders. Whenever you say that you will return to specie payments without reducing the legal tenders, what is to hinder the banks from pouring that mass of legal tenders on you and taking your gold entirely out of your Treasury, they taking the ground, "We will prepare ourselves for the emergency, and leave the Government to take care of itself." For that reason, when we have $350,000,000 of legal tenders in circulation we cannot take that step. Reduce your legal tenders to $150,000,000, or possibly $200,000,000, and you might return to specie payments, because the banks as you reduced your currency would be gradually drawing in their legal tenders so as to keep themselves in condition to present their $80,000,000 for gold whenever you returned to specie payments, and place themselves on a specie basis.

There is no way that I can see except either to increase the gold in the Treasury by borrowing the amount needed to put you in this condition, or to reduce the volume of legal tenders so that you will have specie in the Treasury to meet them when presented. As soon as the Government takes that step the banks will prepare to resume, and they will be ready to redeem their currency, and will place themselves in a position to resume specie payments.

There are some other points that, as the discussion went on, presented themselves to my mind, but I made no note of them, and I do not recall them just at this moment.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I rise to move that the bill under discussion be laid on the table. I do so because I am satisfied that the discussion will not bring any result favorable to the country or agreeable to the Senate. We have spent the whole day already; no two Senators have agreed, and it is one of those subjects on which you will never get two intelligent men to agree as to the details. I am satisfied that the whole discussion is no benefit to the currency question, is an injury to the country, and a great injury to the Republican party. I want all these questions of doubt laid aside until after the election in November. I hope by that time we shall have a Republican President, when we shall be able to go to work and legislate safely and properly for the benefit of the country. This question of currency and of banking, as I said the other day, everybody understands so well that he will not believe anybody else knows anything about it. [Laughter.] I could talk for a week on this subject and you would not be a bit wiser after I was done than when I started. I will not make a speech; I content myself with moving to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 14, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler,

Conkling, Corbett, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Howe, Morton, Patterson of Tennessee, Sprague, Trumbull, Vickers, and Yates—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Cole, Davis, Doolittle, Drake, Fessenden, Fowler, Harlan, Henderson, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Sumner, Tipton, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Conness, Cragin, Dixon, Edmunds, Ferry, Grimes, Howard, Johnson, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Norton, Saulsbury, Stewart, and Thayer—15.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. MORTON. Is it in order to present an amendment to that amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN. No. This is an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from New York asked whether it would promote resumption if all the greenbacks were retired. The Senator from New York must know that the greenbacks are held as a reserve by the national banks of the country. Your law compels every national bank which is a depository to retain one quarter of all its capital circulation and deposits in lawful money of the United States. Withdraw your greenbacks and they must substitute gold or silver, for they must retain this reserve. As your process goes on of withdrawal your specie must flow in to take its place. Hence I should answer the Senator certainly, for you have to substitute an equal amount of coin for the greenbacks you have retired, or nearly that amount.

Mr. President, it is an entire misapprehension that the issue of these $20,000,000 is inflation of the currency. By reference to a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, Executive Document No. 4, it will be found that the States of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Iowa, with eighteen members of Congress and nearly three millions of population, have a circulation of $9,611,000; while the three States of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island, with a representation of sixteen members and a population of between two and three million, have a circulation of $86,864,000, or more than nine times the amount which is awarded to the other three States.

Gentlemen argue that you must issue your currency in proportion to wealth. Very well: take that if you please; I deny that there is this excess of wealth in those three States. It is true that there are larger accumulations in a few of the cities, but the masses of the population of the three States having $9,000,000 of circulation required as many dollars per capita as the masses of the three States having $86,000,000.

Mr. President, in those western States wealth is more equally disseminated among the people. Each farmer, each mechanic, and each laboring man requires as many dollars in currency to transact his business as the same number of laboring men, farmers, and mechanics do either in Connecticut or Rhode Island or Massachusetts. The three States I have named have more currency than they can possibly circulate within their own limits; that currency seeks a vacuum to fill, and that vacuum is found in the States of Wisconsin, Iowa, and Michigan; and I name those three States, not because they are the smallest, but because they are a fair average. The State of Michigan has a circulation of $3,822,000. It requires constantly $15,000,000 to move our products, our lumber, our iron, our wool, wheat, corn, and oats. It requires, I say, $15,000,000 constantly to carry on our business operations. The difference between $3,822,000 and $15,000,000 has to be supplied from Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, and other States that have an excess. We have the capital, we have the will, we have the wealth; we have everything except the opportunity to introduce this circulation. Now, give us this opportunity and you send home to Massachusetts, to Rhode Island, and to Connecticut what they do not require and cannot use. It is not an inflation of the currency; it is simply driving home what we do not want, driving from our own circulation what we are prepared to furnish ourselves if you will give us an opportunity. That is the operation of this section; it is not to inflate your currency by any manner of means.

Mr. President, the very moment this Government is prepared to redeem its issues you will find your banking institutions prepared to redeem theirs. I am willing to-day to give free banking facilities to all sections that require them. Let your Government take care of its paper, and let the banks take care of theirs. Your security is ample; you issue ninety per cent. only of the face of your Government bonds. Those bonds are now worth 116, and you have twenty-five per cent. margin. Let the banks and the bankers take care of themselves. Whenever the Government is prepared to resume specie payments, general resumption will be at hand and at hand at once.

I repeat, sir, that this is no inflation. It does not add a dollar to your circulating medium. Those States that have more than they can use will be compelled to surrender their circulation, except what they require, and not fill the vacuum of the West and the South. There is where the excessive circulation in Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, and the other eastern States that have from fifty to one hundred dollars per capita, which they cannot use in those States, goes to; they use the excess in filling the vacuums of the Northwest, the West, and the South.

The only portion of this bill that I consider of any value whatever is the last section. The first section is utterly atrocious; but, sir, I shall allude to that when it comes up for examination. The first section, I say, is atrocious. Even the name of the bill should be changed if you are going to pass that; it should be characterized from that first section as a bill to enable a few banks and bankers in the great cities of New York, Philadelphia, and Boston to swindle the balance of the United States. That is all of it; it is nothing more and nothing less. But, as I said before, I shall discuss that when it comes up for discussion. I hope this amendment of the Senator from Vermont will not prevail. The last section is the only thing that would induce me to vote for the bill at all, but it is virtually destroyed by the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not suppose it is contemplated to complete the consideration of this bill to-night, and as it is five o'clock I do not see the necessity of staying here any longer, and staying every day to unusual hours. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the Senator withdraw his motion for a moment, that I may make a statement in reply to the remarks of the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator from Rhode Island renew my motion?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Very well; I withdraw it.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from Michigan has arrayed the population and representation of Wisconsin, Michigan, and Iowa against the population and the representation of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island, showing how much larger a proportion of the national currency is in the smaller States.

Now, sir, if the currency was to be distributed according to population, his argument would be a very sound one; but I think it is very apparent that the currency should be distributed according to business. An agricultural population requires much less currency than a manufacturing and mechanical population. There is perhaps no better evidence of that kind of business, of that kind of production which requires a banking circulation, than the returns of the internal revenue. The three States which the Senator has named, Wisconsin, Michigan, and Iowa, pay to the internal revenue $7,600,000. Rhode Island pays

$5,000,000, two thirds as much as those three States combined; and Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island together pay $40,600,000 of internal revenue, against $7,600,000 in the States he has adduced as having a smaller circulation.

I do not know but that the circulation ought to be equalized. Perhaps there is a larger proportion of the circulation in those States which first felt the necessity of obtaining it, and which if they did not feel that necessity, having a banking circulation that was driven out of existence by the taxation of the Government, were compelled to take the national circulation. But certainly there ought to be a very great disproportion as estimated by population between the States which the Senator from Michigan has brought up in comparison with each other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I thought the Senator from Rhode Island was going to renew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. I beg the Senator's pardon. I pledged myself to renew the motion to adjourn, which I now do; but I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope we shall have a vote on the question we have debated so long.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope my friend from Rhode Island will withdraw the motion to adjourn that I may offer a resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is in the hands of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Very well.

RECEPTION OF THE CHINESE EMBASSY.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That Mr. Burlingame and his associates of the Chinese embassy be invited to visit the Senate at one o'clock of Wednesday next.

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed by the Chair to wait upon them and introduce them to the Senate.

If the Senate will allow me, I will make an explanation with regard to the precedent that I have followed in drawing these resolutions. It is the precedent of Louis Kossuth, who was received by the Senate in January, 1852.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I did not yield for the purpose of a speech.

Mr. SUMNER. I am not going to make a speech; I hope the Senator will pardon me; I am only going to read from the Journal of the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. My motion is pending to adjourn if the Senator intends to make an argument on these resolutions.

Mr. SUMNER. I will say nothing that I think the Senator himself will not be willing to hear; I wish simply to read the record from the Journal of the Senate on a kindred case. On the 8th of December, 1851, Mr. Shields moved the following resolution:

"Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed by the Chair to wait upon Louis Kossuth on his arrival at the capital and introduce him to the Senate."

After discussion that passed by 80 yeas and 15 nays. Afterward a select committee of three are appointed consisting of Mr. Shields, Mr. Seward, and Mr. Foote of Mississippi. This committee, by Mr. Shields, reported afterwards as follows:

"That the committee recommend that the same proceedings be pursued as in the case of General La Fayette, to wit: that the chairman of the committee introduce him in these words: We present Louis Kossuth to the Senate of the United States; upon which the Senators are recommended to rise, and the President will invite him to be seated.

The report was read; and on motion.

"Resolved, That the Senate agree thereto."

Afterward, under date of January 5, 1852, I find the following entry:

"At one o'clock Louis Kossuth was conducted into the Chamber of the Senate by the committee appointed for the purpose; and

Mr. SHIELDS, as chairman of the committee, introduced him to the Senate.

The Senate having risen, the President pro tempore addressed him as follows:

"Louis Kossuth: I welcome you to the Senate of the United States. The committee will conduct you to the seat which I have caused to be prepared for you.

"The Senators having resumed their seats.

"On motion by Mr. MANGUM.

"That the Senate adjourn, in order that the members may present their respects to Louis Kossuth individually.

"It was determined in the affirmative; and

"The Senate adjourned."

Mr. HENDRICKS. Who does the Senator propose shall repeat that to the Chinese?

Mr. SUMNER. The President of the Senate.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move to amend the resolutions by inserting Thursday instead of Wednesday. Wednesday is set apart for bills of the Pension Committee.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg to say to the Senator that it will not take more than twenty minutes.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. But if as in the other case the Senate adjourn—

Mr. SUMNER and others. No, no.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I am opposed to these resolutions, although I do not intend to consume time in debating them. I will simply state what action, in my opinion, ought to be taken, and for that I believe also there is precedent. It is, if the chairman of our Committee on Foreign Relations thinks it expedient, that Mr. Burlingame and his people may appear here informally, and that a simple motion that the Senate take a recess for fifteen or twenty minutes be submitted and agreed to. I do not think this is a case resembling that of the visit of La Fayette to the Federal city, or can be put upon a similar footing. I think it is a visit perhaps as much of curiosity upon both sides as anything which can be imagined. The convenient and proper mode for disposing of this subject by the Senate is, when these persons arrive here, to simply take a recess of fifteen minutes, and let members see them. I submit, therefore, that the best way will be to either adjourn or lay these resolutions on the table, and then let the other course be adopted.

The resolutions were agreed to; and Messrs. SUMNER, SHERMAN, and JOHNSON were appointed the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is, by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 17, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Conness, Corbett, Davis, Drake, Fessenden, Fowler, Hendricks, McCreery, Morton, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Sprague, Tipton, and Vickers—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Cole, Conkling, Cragin, Drake, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Henderson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Dixon, Edmunds, Ferry, Grimes, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Norton, Saulsbury, Thayer, and Willey—12.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 291) giving additional compensation to certain employes in the civil service of the Government in Washington, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted upon its amendment to the bill of the Senate (S. No. 184) granting a pension to Mrs. Ann Corcoran, and agrees to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and has appointed Mr. VAN AERNAM of New York, Mr. MILLER of Pennsylvania, and Mr. BURK of Illinois, managers at the same on its part.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 534) relating to contested elections in the city of Washington, District of Columbia.

NATIONAL BANKS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill No. 440 is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Fessenden, Harlan, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Van Winkle, Vickers, Willey, and Wilson—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Davis, Drake, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, McCreery, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Tipton, Trumbull, Wade, Williams, and Yates—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Ferry, Grimes, Howard, Johnson, Norton, Saulsbury, and Thayer—11.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The next question is on the adoption of the section itself?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. That amendment is the adoption of the last section?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir; that is the question.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer an amendment to the fifth section, to strike out all after the enacting clause—

Mr. SHERMAN. That amendment is not yet in order. The final vote is not taken on the section.

Mr. DAVIS. This is a substitute for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the committee is not yet disposed of.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Kentucky offers a substitute for the pending amendment of the committee.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer a substitute for the fifth section of the pending amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is in order.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to strike out all of the section after the enacting clause, and to insert:

That there shall be withdrawn by the Comptroller of the Currency from the banks of any State or Territory that may have an excess of circulation notes upon the principle of their distribution as regulated by law and the rules established by the Treasury Department, and the circulation notes so withdrawn shall be distributed by the Comptroller of the Currency among the national banks of such States and Territories as may have less than their proper proportion of circulation notes.

I will say a word or two upon this amendment. It seems to be admitted here that some of the States have two or three times more than their proportion of the circulation notes. There is a great opposition to inflation and to the increase of the public debt; and I feel all that opposition myself; but it comes directly and most actively from the States that have this excess of circulation notes, and especially from the New England States. Now, if the honorable Senator from Vermont, and the other Senators from that portion of the Union are so strenuous in their opposition—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will appeal to the Senator from Kentucky, if he will allow me, to know if he will give way for an adjournment? It is evident that we cannot get through with this measure to-night, and it is now nearly half past five o'clock.

Mr. DAVIS. As my remarks would extend for some fifteen or twenty minutes, I would prefer to give way.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move, then, that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for a division on that motion.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think we had better adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire, with the leave of the Senate, to say one word on this motion. I object to the adjournment on the statement made to me by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] that he desires to take up an appropriation bill to-morrow. If the Senate desires to continue this bill to-morrow I have no objection to the adjournment; but I do not want to adjourn now, and when we meet to-morrow find this measure antagonized with an appropriation bill and have a discussion as to the order of business. If the Senate adjourn now I hope it will be with the understanding that we shall go right along with this bill tomorrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn is not debatable.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Connors, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Drake, Hendricks, Howe, McCreery, Morton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Sprague, Tipton, Trumbull, Vickers, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Yates—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Cole, Conkling, Frelighuysen, Henderson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Pomeroy, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, and Wilson—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Harlan, Howard, Johnson, Norton, Saulsbury, and Thayer—14.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. PRUYN. Mr. Speaker, I have a petition, accompanied by a joint resolution, from John A. Dix, Richard M. Blatchford, and George Opdyke, custodians of $2,000,000 on the part of the Government, to be expended at the time communication was cut off between Washington and the North at the opening of the rebellion. These gentlemen expended that money, but there are two accounts standing open on the books of the Treasury against them, and they ask to have the proper credits made for the purpose of extinguishing that apparent charge. I introduce a bill to that effect, accompanied by a statement of the case, and I ask its reference to the proper committee.

The bill (H. R. No. 1273) in reference to certain accounts on the books of the Treasury Department against John A. Dix, Richard M. Blatchford, and George Opdyke was read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. This claim being novel in its character, the Chair cannot designate the appropriate committee, but would suggest the Committee on Public Expenditures.

The bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXTRA PAY TO GOVERNMENT EMPLOYÉS.

The SPEAKER. There being no further bills and joint resolutions, the next business in order during the morning hour is the call of the States and Territories for resolutions, and the House resumes the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 291) giving additional compensation to certain employés in the civil service of the Government at Washington, introduced on Monday last by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WASHBURN.] The question is on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I withdraw the demand for the previous question, and modify the joint resolution; and on it, as modified, I demand the previous question.

The joint resolution, as modified, was read. It provides that there shall be allowed and paid out of any money applicable to the purpose, heretofore or hereafter to be appropriated to the same classes of officers and other persons in the civil service of the United States Government at Washington embraced in the joint resolution of Congress entitled "Joint resolution giving additional compensation to certain employés in the civil service of the Government at Washington," passed February 28, 1867, an additional compensation of twenty per cent. on their respective salaries as fixed by law, or where no salary is fixed by law upon their pay respectively from and after the 30th day of June, 1867, to the 30th of June, 1868. But if any such officer or other person shall have performed service for less than one year, he is to be allowed the twenty per cent. only upon the actual sum he shall have received for such service. So much of such additional compensation as may be due to the employés of the Patent Office is to be paid out of the funds of that office. The resolution is not to apply to persons whose salaries as fixed by law exceed $2,500 per annum. No person who has served in the confederate army, so called, is to be entitled to the additional compensation. The resolution includes such persons as have been employed in any capacity in the Government Printing Office, or in any of the Departments, and the watchmen on the Dome of the Capitol and in the Capitol grounds, the inspector of marble, and the foreman of mechanics at work on the Capitol extension, and the watchmen on said extension, whether inside or out, and the employés of the jail; and it includes not only those now in the service, but those who have at any time during said year been in the service.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit to my colleague that that proposition does not embrace the $900 female clerks. I hope he will modify it so as to embrace that class of clerks.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask the gentleman to allow me to offer an amendment, to which there will be no objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Then I hope the previous question will be voted down.

The question was put on seconding the previous question; and there were—ayes 55; noes 47.

Mr. FARNSWORTH demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. FARNSWORTH, and WASHBURN of Indiana, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 55.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question was upon ordering the main question; which was then taken.

Before the result was announced,

Mr. UPSON called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MULLINS. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. UPSON and Mr. BENJAMIN called for the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. HARDING. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. HARDING. I desire to know whether the mover of this joint resolution can accept such an amendment as will give those who now receive thirty dollars a month a yearly salary of $600?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary question which the Chair can entertain at this time.

Mr. HARDING. I want to know if the gentleman will accept such an amendment?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I will inform the gentleman privately, if he will ask me.

Mr. UPSON. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays upon ordering the main question.

The main question was then ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon the motion to lay the joint resolution on the table; upon which the yeas and nays have been called.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 55, nays 73, not voting 61; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bailey, Baker, Beaman, Beatty, Beck, Benjamin, Benton, Boutwell, Buckland, Butler, Churchhill, Reader W. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—61.

So the joint resolution was not laid on the table.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

The joint resolution was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Upon that question I call the previous question.

Mr. MULLINS. I desire to offer an amendment to this joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. No amendment is now in order.

The previous question was then seconded and the main question ordered; which was upon the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. WARD. Upon that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were thirty-four in the affirmative.

So the affirmative being more than one fifth of the last vote the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 71, nays 59; not voting 59; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Baldwin, Barnes, Bingham, Blair, Boyer, Burr, Cake, Cary, Cobb, Cornell, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Gravely, Higby, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Johnson, Julian, Kitchen, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Mallory, McCormick, Miller, Moore, Morrell, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Phelps, Plants, Pomerooy, Pruyn, Randall, Raum, Robinson, Shellabarger, Spalding, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Stone, Taber, Taffe, Thomas, Twichell, Robert T. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Arnell, Barnum, Beck, Bromwell, Brooks, Broomall, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Dawes, Delano, Eldridge, Finney, Fox, Getz, Griswold, Haight, Hill, Hooper, Asahel W. Washburn, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—59.

So the joint resolution was passed.

The announcement of the vote was greeted with applause by spectators in the gallery, which was promptly checked by the Speaker.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

TAXES ON WHISKY AND TOBACCO.

Mr. SHANKS. I submit the following resolution; on which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That in the judgment of this House it will inflict a serious loss upon the national revenues to delay the revision of the taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco until the same can be accomplished by a general revision of the entire internal revenue system; and the Committee of Ways and Means is hereby instructed to report without delay a separate bill for the revision of the taxes on the manufacture and sale of distilled spirits and tobacco.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope there will be no attempt to force through such a resolution as this without hearing from the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. MAYNARD. Cannot this proposition be debated?

The SPEAKER. It cannot, while the call for the previous question is pending.

The previous question was seconded; there being—ayes 62, noes 48.

The question being, Shall the main question be now put?

Mr. PILE moved that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. SCHENCK. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 60, nays 79, not voting 50; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Beatty, Boutwell, Cake, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Cullom, Eckley, Eggleston, Ela, Farnsworth, Garfield, Gravely, Griswold, Higby, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Judd, Kitchen, Loan, Logan, McClurg, Miller, Morrell, Mullins, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Paine, Phelps, Pile, Polsley, Pomerooy, Raum, Sawyer, Schenck, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Taffe, Taylor, Twichell, Robert T. Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, and John T. Wilson—60.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Axtell, Barnes, Beaman, Beck, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boyer, Buckland, Burr, Butler, Cary, Corvode, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Halsey, Harding, Hawkins, Holman, Hotchkiss, Hulburd, Humphrey, Johnson, Julian, Kelsey, Knott, Koonitz, Laffin, Lincoln, Loughridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McCormick, Mercur, Moore, Nunn, Peters, Pike, Plants, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Scofield, Shanks, Shellabarger, Spalding, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, Taber, Thomas, Lawrence S. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Arnell, Baldwin, Barnum, Bromwell, Brooks, Broomall, Chanler, Churchhill, Delano, Eldridge, Finney, Fox, Getz, Haight, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hunter, Jones, Kelley, Kerr, Ketcham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Marshall, McCullough, Moorhead, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Orth, Perham, Poland, Robertson, Ross, Selye, Sitgreaves, Smith, John Trimble, Van Aukun, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, William B. Washburn, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—50.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House has refused to lay the resolution on the table; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a privileged question.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have not yielded the floor. Mr. Speaker, am I not entitled to be heard on the motion I have made?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not. The question is undebatable.

Mr. MAYNARD. Then I yield the floor to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded. I desire to know whether this House will summarily lay aside the tax bill, upon which so much labor has been expended, without hearing the nine gentlemen who, as the Committee of Ways and Means, have been charged with the preparation of that bill.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. Mr. SCHENCK. I know it is not; but I must protest against the committee being choked down without an opportunity to make an explanation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. We have voted away about two million dollars to give extra pay to the clerks in the Departments, and I am opposed to remaining here to impose additional taxes on the people to pay that extra allowance.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is not in order.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have made a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to lay the resolution on the table; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays cannot be taken on reconsidering the vote by which the previous question was seconded, because the vote on seconding the previous question cannot be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. MAYNARD. My motion is to reconsider the vote on laying on the table.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman vote with the majority?

Mr. MAYNARD. I did. I changed my vote for the purpose of making this motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. MAYNARD. Am I not entitled to the floor on that?

The SPEAKER. You are not, for two reasons. The motion to reconsider the vote refusing to lay the resolution on the table is not debatable, nor is the motion to lay on the table debatable.

Mr. MAYNARD. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. MAYNARD. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 71, nays 62, not voting 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Axtell, Barnes, Beaman, Beck, Benjamin, Blaine, Blair, Boyer, Buckland, Burr, Butler, Cary, Covode, Dawes, Delano, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Halsey, Harding, Hawkins, Holman, Hotchkiss, Hulburd, Humphrey, Johnson, Julian, Kelsey, Knott, Koontz, Laffin, Lincoln, Loughbridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, McCormick, Mercer, Moore, Peters, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Shanks, Shellabarger, Spalding, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, Taber, Thomas, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Van Trump, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, and Woodward—71.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Beatty, Benton, Bingham, Boutwell, Cake, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Cullom, Eckley, Eggleston, Ela, Farnsworth, Garfield, Griswold, Higby, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Judd, Kitchen, Loan, Logan, Maynard, McClurg, Miller, Morrill, Mullins, Myers, Newcomb, Niblack, O'Neill, Paine, Pike, Plants, Polsey, Pomerooy, Raum, Sawyer, Schenck, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Taffo, Taylor, Twichell, Robert T. Van Horn, Welker, Thomas Williams, and William Williams—62.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Arnell, Baldwin, Barnum, Brooks, Broomall, Chanler, Churchill, Driggs, Eldridge, Finney, Fox, Getz, Graveley, Haight, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hunter, Jones, Kelley, Kerr, Ketcham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Marshall, McCullough, Moorhead, Morrissey, Mungen, Nicholson, Nunn, Orth, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Poland, Robertson, Ross, Scofield, Selye, Sitgreaves, Smith, John Trimble, Van Aukun, Bart Van Horn, Van Wyck, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—56.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded. I want to see whether this House will accept any explanation. [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. MAYNARD. I make another motion. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That comes from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MAYNARD. I give notice—
[Cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. If gentlemen persist in speaking when called to order, the Chair will be compelled to bring the matter to the notice of the House.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask the Committee of Ways and Means have five minutes for explanation.

Mr. HARDING. I object.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask for the yeas and nays on the adjournment. If the House adjourns the Committee of Ways and Means, being refused any opportunity of explanation upon this floor in relation to the condition of the bill and how speedily we may have action on it, we may be able to reach the country through the public press. [Cries of "Order!"]

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 20, nays 104, not voting 65; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Blair, Boyer, Cake, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Cornell, Ferriss, Glossbrenner, Harding, Judd, Kitchen, Niblack, O'Neill, Polsey, Randall, Aaron F. Stevens, Robert T. Van Horn, William Williams, and John T. Wilson—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Barnes, Beaman, Beatty, Beck, Benjamin, Benton, Boutwell, Buckland, Burr, Butler, Cary, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Delano, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Ela, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Golladay, Graveley, Grover, Halsey, Higby, Holman, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Johnson, Julian, Kelsey, Knott, Koontz, Laffin, Lincoln, Loan, Loughbridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McClurg, McCormick, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Morrill, Mullins, Myers, Newcomb, Paine, Peters, Pike, Plants, Pomerooy, Price, Pruyn, Raum, Sawyer, Scofield, Shanks, Shellabarger, Spalding, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Taber, Taffo, Taylor, Thomas, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Van Trump, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, and Woodward—104.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Barnum, Bingham, Blaine, Broomwell, Brooks, Broomall, Chanler, Dixon, Eldridge, Finney, Fox, Getz, Griswold, Haight, Hawkins, Hill, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Jones, Kelley, Kerr, Ketcham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Logan, Marshall, McCullough, Moorhead, Morrissey, Mungen, Nicholson, Nunn, Orth, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Poland, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Schenck, Selye, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stone, John Trimble, Van Aukun, Bart Van Horn, Van Wyck, William B. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—65.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurred on reconsidering the vote by which the previous question was seconded.

Mr. SCHENCK. On that I ask for tellers. Tellers were ordered.

Mr. PILE. I think there will be no objection to the chairman of the committee being heard fifteen minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. I will consent, provided somebody may be allowed the same time to answer.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I object.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

Mr. SCHENCK. Can the yeas and nays be called on that motion?

The SPEAKER. They cannot.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. SCHENCK and SHANKS.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 63, noes 52.

The question recurred on ordering the main question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move that the House take a recess till half past seven o'clock this evening.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that motion in order. The only doubt the Chair has is that the House is acting under the previous question. The Clerk will read the rule in relation to recess.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Where it is convenient that the business of the House be suspended for a short time, as for a conference presently to be held, &c., it adjourns during pleasure. But it is not in order pending a motion to suspend the rules, so as to take an immediate vote on a pending proposition."

The SPEAKER. No motion to suspend the rules is now pending, and the motion for a recess is in order.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Will a motion to suspend the rule to allow the Committee of Ways and Means to be heard a few minutes be in order?

The SPEAKER. That motion will be in order, because the rule in regard to suspending the rules applies on Monday to anything before the House at the time.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I make that motion.

Mr. BUTLER. Add to it that those opposed may have an equal length of time.

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules will not be in order till after the vote is taken on the motion to take a recess.

Mr. MAYNARD. I withdraw the motion for a recess.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I then move to suspend the rules to allow the Committee of Ways and Means half an hour to speak upon the original motion, to refer this subject back to the committee, and also to allow the friends of the motion fifteen minutes in addition.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend the motion by saying half an hour to each side.

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules cannot be amended.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will modify my motion in the way suggested by my colleague, so as to allow the friends of the motion half an hour.

The question being taken on suspending the rules, it was agreed to—ayes 76, noes 36; two thirds having voted in the affirmative.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to go on myself. After hearing what gentlemen have to say in opposition, I will allow some of my colleagues on the committee to reply.

Mr. BUTLER. I rise to a point of order in regard to the debate. As this is an argument upon the pending motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. SHANKS,] I desire to inquire whether it is for the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to close the debate, or for those to whom he shall give the time allowed to the committee?

The SPEAKER. The order of the House controls that question. The rules having been suspended, whatever usage may prevail on that subject is also suspended. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] will correct the Chair if he is wrong, but he understood the motion to be to allow a half an hour to the Committee of Ways and Means, and a half an hour in reply to those who are in favor of the pending resolution.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I think that was the way the motion was made.

Mr. SCHENCK. Any way the House pleases. Mr. Speaker, after the decisive vote that was given the other day when an attempt was made to resist going into Committee of the Whole to consider this bill at all, I supposed we had passed the point and had reached that view and condition of the subject that the House, or at least all on this side of the House, would unite in endeavoring to push this bill through and perfect it in such a manner as to be able at the earliest possible time to send it to the Senate. I have looked at that vote, and find in it that which part surprises me, and that which does not. At that time the House decided to go on with the bill by a vote of 82 against 57. Seventy-five of the eighty-two were Republicans in this House. Of the fifty-seven nearly one half were Democrats. Nearly every Democrat voted against it with the exception of two gentlemen who vote with us and sustain us, being members of the Committee of Ways and Means, and having devoted their time to this whole matter—the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] and the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK.] With these two exceptions, nearly every Democrat, except four or five, voted not to go on with this business.

I could understand that, because these gentlemen have not the responsibility that I had supposed the Republican party felt in the legislation in which we are engaged. Gentlemen of the Republican party will say, however, that their object is not to shirk this responsibility, but to reach such a position of things that we may meet the most crying demands of the country, legislate in regard to tobacco and distilled spirits, and leave everything to await future legislation that concerns other matters connected with the public revenue. The first reply I have to make in behalf of the Committee of Ways and Means to that, is this: we have spent—I need not say how laboriously—more than five months in preparing the bill. We have had before us hundreds and thousands of persons representing all the various interests of the country in relation to these subjects. We have attempted to present a bill which should be an entirety, a bill which should cover the whole ground, and a bill which, considering all subjects, as well those continued, those changed, and those released from burdens, would in the aggregate give us means to support and carry on the Government by supplying sufficient revenue. It is proposed now to break the entirety of this bill, and to confine the attention of Congress to legislating only upon distilled spirits and tobacco. And when is that motion made? Why, when in the bill before us, we have passed over one hundred and seventy-six pages of it and there are little more than the same number, perhaps, remaining, being almost entirely made up of these subjects of tobacco and distilled spirits. And the fact is, as I feel free to explain to the House, that this very morning, having taken up the bill at the point at which it was left on Saturday by the House, we find that the next subject is "lotteries." We do not suppose that, so far as lotteries and theaters are concerned, there is really any disposition to legislate, not in accord with the committee in their behalf, and that from these things a little more revenue might be raised. Yet these are to be cut off.

We come next to mineral oils. After full discussion of that subject, hearing, as we are accustomed to do, all the interests of the country, and after considerable deliberation, the committee have come to the conclusion to move to strike out all the sections in relation to mineral oils excepting the one hundred and thirty-second section, which provides against explosive compounds, and leave mineral oils among the general manufactures of the country relating to useful articles. That would have disposed of fourteen pages more of the bill. And then, after a few minutes more of work, I feel warranted in saying to the House and the country less than half the bill would have remained. And that remaining portion, with the exception of incomes and legacies, where very little change is made from the present law, and no changes except such as have been suggested by members of the House, and on which we find there will be general concurrence—nearly the whole of that remaining portion of the bill is made up of the two subjects of tobacco and its manufactures and distilled spirits.

Just when the House has reached these subjects, just when we stand before the country ready to take up these matters and dispose of them, having completed the rest of our work, and being ready to report it to the House to be put upon its passage, we find this exhibition of opposition made here; made with the concurrence, I admit, of nearly the united Democratic party here, and made also, to our surprise, with the concurrence of about one third or a little more of the members on this side of the House with whom we are accustomed to act.

Now, sir, it must be obvious that there is some reason underneath all this which the Committee of Ways and Means cannot comprehend. What is it? Gentlemen think in good faith, as I am bound to believe, that a bill might be brought in relating to the subjects of tobacco and distilled spirits, short, brief, covering all the ground necessary upon these subjects, and passed through the House and Senate, so that we may speedily go home.

Now, I undertake to say, in the first place, that a very large proportion of this bill in relation to those two subjects, although made up of various details in relation to the mode of collecting the taxes, and the mode of preventing frauds, almost all those details must necessarily be incorporated in any bill that may be passed upon this subject. Even if we should report a bill upon those subjects alone, we should feel compelled, with the views we have acquired after months of examination, to retain those features to a very great extent. We should do this, whether the tax on whisky be put up or down; and I have before notified the House that the impression of the members of the Committee of Ways and Means, or a majority of them, is that the tax on whisky ought to be very materially reduced. In either case, however, we should have to retain pretty much all of this matter of details in the bill.

What more? If gentlemen will study this bill they will find that we must retain about one half of all that portion of the bill which we have already gone over; because we have undertaken not only to reform the provisions of the present law in relation to frauds in the collection of taxes upon particular subjects, but we have gone into the whole administrative department of the bureau or department, whatever it may be made, for the collection of internal revenue, with a few to simplifying it upon the one hand and making it more efficient upon the other. And I would scarcely give you a snap of my finger for all in this bill in relation to distilled spirits and tobacco and its manufactures, however valuable I think that matter is, unless you connect with it certain administrative sections, running all through this bill, and intended to make possible the collection of such taxes as you may impose.

Take a single illustration, the matter of revenue stamps. I have the utmost confidence in the integrity and earnestness of the present Commissioner of Internal Revenue, however some gentlemen may possibly differ in relation to his energy and decision of character, and whether he has been sharp enough in defending himself against influences of a political character in the one direction, which hamper and prevent his usefulness, or against the frauds in another direction which are practiced. But while I have that confidence in him, let me say to this House and to the country, that we found in the present law, among other things, that there was no check whatever upon the subject of the issuing of revenue and other stamps; and that while the Commissioner was putting three or four or five million dollars' worth of stamps upon the markets of the country through official channels, he might, if he had been so disposed, put one or two or three million dollars' worth of stamps on the market on his own motion and pocket the proceeds. Now, we have attempted through checks to remedy all that by requiring all the stamps manufactured and issued under the direction of the Treasury Department to be issued to and charged as money against the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and to be issued by him to and charged against all the other officers of the law engaged in the business. But I give this only as an illustration.

I say that all through this bill there are, as we confidently believe, many eminent reforms made, to which in great part we have now had the assent of this House, and which are essentially necessary, if you are going to collect your tax even upon distilled spirits and tobacco.

But after all our labor in the presentation of the subject in the House, we are met by an attempt to get away from it. I inquire again, why this feeling? A little while ago, within three days past, I was glad to feel myself sustained, not only by the vote that was taken a week ago, but by expressions in harmony with that vote made by members all around this Hall, including some who are now voting to give the whole subject the go-by. What has influenced them? I speak with the utmost respect when I say (not speaking of the action of the Senate) that Senators have been very busy in representing to members of this House that if the bill revising the whole revenue law be passed as an entirety and sent to them they cannot afford to take the responsibility of cutting it down to a partial bill upon particular subjects, but must go through the whole of it, and that thus the House and the Senate may be kept here until perhaps the end of August. Well, sir, so far as I am concerned, I am not going to legislate with reference to the opinions of the Senate or of Senators. I shall endeavor, as a member of this House and a Representative of the country, to do what the people expect and demand and what is right to be done in regard to a revision of the taxes, and I will let those at the other end of the Capitol take the responsibility of their own action. But I say that, after the bill has been matured first by the Committee of Ways and Means, then subjected to the criticism of all parties interested in its various parts who have come before us since it was put in print and sent out to the world, and then, under the light of those criticisms, amended in the House and perfected so far as this House is able to perfect it, there is no reason why the labor of the Senate should be so long and so exhausting either upon their time and attention or upon the time of gentlemen here who are anxious to get away.

Now, then, one word (which I wish also to go to the country) in behalf of the Committee of Ways and Means. During fourteen years' service in Congress I have never known a committee (and in this I am to be understood as speaking of other gentlemen, and not myself) who labored so persistently, so continuously, in season and out of season, by night and by day, meeting every day, not excepting a half dozen days, for four or five months past, as the Committee of Ways and Means have done. And this bill is the work they have presented.

Now, sir, while the impeachment trial was going on, while members around me (and I see dozens of such) were at home with their families, and while since then, since we have taken up this bill, members whom I see before me were at home looking after their nominations or something else, this committee has stayed here and worked on; and (I say it in no offensive sense) the very gentleman who is the medium for presenting this morning this resolution to give the bill the go-by has, I believe, been at home, looking after his interests there, and was not here the other day to vote upon the bill. I do not know how much time he has been here since the bill has been going on in Committee of the Whole; he can explain for himself. I mean nothing offensive in the allusion; but I say that the opposition to the consideration of the bill comes in great part (and I speak of what I know the record shows) from gentlemen who have been enjoying days and weeks, perhaps in some instances nearly months, of leisure at their homes with their families and about their private business, while we have been working on and on every day, and almost every night.

I do not say this in praise of the work that we present. That must be taken for what it is worth. It must be taken on its merits. But I say that when we are half through that work, and more than half through, when we have reached just those subjects of distilled spirits and tobacco, leaving little or nothing that will cost more than a few hours' labor except those very subjects which are made the occasion of offering this resolution, it does not look well; and it shall be understood by the country—for I now proclaim it—that there is an attempt made to throw us back upon a condition of things which will require that another week or more shall be employed by the committee in putting together all the different parts of the bill necessary to help out the collection of the tax upon these objects. And I want that particular fact specially noted. I have already explained that there are pages upon tobacco, there are pages upon distilled spirits, but we cannot present anything like a perfect or consistent bill unless we add to those parts section after section to be culled out, rearranged, and modified from other parts of the bill, now relating to all subjects which are to be objects of administrative law, but which must then be so fashioned as to apply particularly and only to these, but which must be put into the bill even if they do apply only to these.

To do that work will require the committee, in my belief, as long or near as long, I believe quite as long, if they do their work well and properly, as it will require to go through with this bill in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I give it not only as my own opinion, but as the opinion of the Committee of Ways and Means. And I know what I say. I give it as the opinion of the committee, with all the good faith to go at this work and do what we can, we cannot prepare such a bill as you will instruct us to bring in under about the same time it will take us to go through with the remainder of the bill.

In order to lighten the labor of the Committee of the Whole on the subject of tobacco we have been in session an hour and a half before you, gentlemen, who are now opposing this bill, thought it necessary to come here. We have been here since half past ten o'clock this morning; and there are now delegations from different traders and manufacturers of tobacco waiting in the committee-room with whom we have not finished. We have been running backward and forward, as well as we could, between the House and the committee-room, attending to our votes here while endeavoring to carry on our action there. The result of the discussion this morning is that the criticisms provoked from the tobacco trade and tobacco manufacturers represented in the various branches of the trade by the publication of our bill have been met and considered, and we are ready to present such questions to the House for their consideration as will provide modifications or amendments to be made so far as that interest is concerned.

And, sir, the same thing is true in regard to distilled spirits. We have notified gentlemen to appear before us to-morrow and next day with a view to meeting their criticisms and listening patiently to what they have to suggest, so we may collect the revenue which the Government ought to have and at the same time provide no injustice shall be done to any citizen.

But in the midst of this we are to be set at a different work; in the midst of this we are to be thrown back to begin again; in the midst of this we are to take up this bill, repair to our committee-room, and in the hour or so we can get each morning before we come to attend to our business here set ourselves to work to bring in the two subjects in one bill which these gentlemen think ought alone to be put into this bill—something about distilled spirits and something on the subject of tobacco, and as we say it must also give us something which will provide the necessary machinery and administrative sections to secure the collection of the taxes you want to derive from these sources.

Mr. Speaker, I could talk a long time upon this subject if I were so disposed, and longer than the time allowed me; but I think I shall not extend my remarks further.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to ask my colleague whether, in his judgment, if we pass the bill as it now lies upon our table, in case it should be found necessary to do ultimately just what this resolution looks to, it will not be better to pass the bill as it now is and allow the Senate to cut out such portions as they can get through with speedily and return to us, and whether that would not accomplish the object of the resolution better than the adoption of the pending resolution.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think what I have said leaves that fairly to be inferred. That certainly is my opinion. I say we cannot get back such a bill as these gentlemen ask for in much less time than it will take to go through this bill now just as it is; and I say if we are to go at that work after this bill has left this House, then in the House committee we can do it as well as between now and then. It seems to be a difficulty that Senators have said they will not take the responsibility of cutting down the bill in that way, and therefore out of great respect for those Senators, and for fear that the Senate will keep us here a long time, we must accommodate our views to theirs, and take upon ourselves the labor of presenting a half bill instead of leaving it to the other branch of Congress.

Now sir, I do not believe that it will take any such time as has been spoken of. How much time has been occupied on this subject? There was the DELANO and Morgan case. There were various occasions when reports were made from the managers, and Mr. Woolley was brought before us. There have been questions from the Committee on Appropriations brought in from time to time. There have been various other incidental matters cutting down the time allowed us since the first day of this month when we first took up this bill in the House, besides the time allowed for general debate, so that we have not had five whole days on this bill this far. I do not think we have had more than four. And yet we have gone half through the bill.

When I predicted that we could go through this bill in three weeks gentlemen said oh, if that were possible they were willing to go on; but they thought it would take nearer three months. Sir, suppose we have used two weeks. The House will understand that another week most probably, if gentlemen will stay here and keep a quorum, will do the work. I admit that we must have the presence of members. I admit that members must not go away and break up a quorum and then come back and try to break down the bill. That will not answer. But if we can have a quorum here, a working majority, I say that in all human probability—and what we have done already proves that I am right in my prediction—a week will finish the bill. That is the declaration which I now make in the presence of the House and the country.

Again, I say if this bill gets the go-by, and if in consequence of the action pursued here we are delayed in any way hereafter, it must be remembered who takes the responsibility. It is the Democratic party, almost to a man, with about one third of the Republican party. I cannot tell what the vote has been to-day. It has not been so strongly in the direction of sustaining the bill, so far as Republicans are concerned, for fewer of them have sustained it to-day. But the vote the other day was eighty-two for going on with the bill, consisting of seventy-five Republicans and seven Democrats; while against going on with the bill there were thirty-four Republicans and twenty-three Democrats. That is more than two to one of the Republicans in favor of going on. A little more than one third of the Republicans, uniting with nearly the whole of the Democrats, voted against going on with this work. To-day the proportion is pretty nearly the same.

I wish it to be understood, then, that so far as the Committee of Ways and Means are concerned we are sustained by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK,] the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS,] who have stood with us faithfully and manfully on this subject; but with those exceptions nearly the undivided Democracy goes with a portion of the Republican party, and there is no escaping from the conclusion that while the majority of those who feel the responsibility because they represent the party that is in the majority of the House are waiting and anxious to go on, less than a majority are uniting with the Democrats to defeat that object. I will yield the rest of the time to any member of the committee who wishes to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to obtain the floor simply to say that in the statement of the facts relating to the action of the committee, as they have been presented by the chairman of the committee, he has not done more than justice to the committee, while, so far as he himself is concerned, he has failed to do justice to his own labors. For, instead of five months, I think the Calendar will show it is nearer seven. By an assiduity of labor that I have never seen equaled in my experience, this bill has been discussed, its provisions examined one by one, and this is the result of the labor; and I fully concur in what the chairman has stated, that to take out of this bill the subjects of tobacco and distilled spirits, and to introduce them with those provisions of the law which relate to collecting the duty upon them, and adapt them to the present law as it is—to bring this new cloth into old garments—will only operate to make the rent worse. It will require a vast amount of labor, and that labor will not accomplish what is hoped, expected, and believed can be accomplished by this bill. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK.]

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Speaker, I have voted all the while in favor of the proposition to go on with this bill since the motion to postpone it has been submitted. I have done so, in the first place, because I am a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, which reported it, and because I believe that it is only proper courtesy on my part to sustain the committee in a matter of this kind. But I have done it for the additional reason that I think there is much legislation needed upon the subject of internal revenue taxes, some of which, at least, we may be able to accomplish by passing this bill. But I am the more particularly anxious that this proposition to postpone, or in other words to emasculate the bill, shall not succeed for the reason that I think it will result in a positive loss of time to this House and to this Congress. As has been well said by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, we cannot mature a new bill in perhaps less than a week so as to meet the requirements of the resolution now pending. If we should go on with the consideration of the bill, I think we could in that time dispose of it so far as the House is concerned, and we would, therefore, be rid of the question by about the time which will be required for the committee to prepare a new bill as instructed by this resolution. It may be that the Senate, when this bill should reach it, if it ever shall, will decide to take out so much of it as relates to whisky and tobacco, and send it back in this amended form. If so, the responsibility will be upon the Senate, and it will then be a matter of economy of time, perhaps, for them to do so, if they shall so resolve. But for the House to adopt that course, and attempt now to separate some sections of the bill and pass a portion of them, I think would result in an absolute loss of time, and looking to that, and to that alone, I am earnestly opposed to this proposition to postpone the further consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The half hour assigned to the Committee of Ways and Means has expired, and the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. SHANKS,] the mover of the resolution, is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. Before the gentleman proceeds I desire to say that if I was mistaken in what I said in regard to him, I will withdraw it. I believe the gentleman got an indefinite leave of absence, and was away for ten or fifteen days, and has only been here for the last two or three days. I believe he was not here when the bill was taken up, nor when the motion to postpone was made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] He can correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. SHANKS. I do not feel that that is a subject for consideration at present, and while I have the highest regard for the opinions of others, I must say that it is the legitimate duty of every member upon this floor to speak to the business of the House, and not to individuals. I know it is an easy thing to say that you will go to the country and hold members responsible before the country for what they do here. I am responsible to the country for what I do, and I stand before my people to speak for them. I have been with my people; and I now say to you, sir, and to this House, in all kindness, that I think if the gentleman from Ohio had been among his people he would have learned something better than to stand here to-day and say to me what he has said on this question. I do not introduce this resolution for the purpose of hurting the feelings or assailing the judgment or impugning the integrity of any man or set of men.

I have the highest regard for the opinions of the Committee of Ways and Means, and I am glad that they have discussed and examined these matters. But if it is true that they have spent so much time and exercised so much care and deliberation in determining for themselves with such precision the importance and correctness of this work, it certainly cannot be true that they will be so much troubled to take out of the bill and make a simple proposition the provisions in relation to the articles which I have named. If the matter has been so thoroughly considered it cannot be difficult to take from the bill these particular provisions and bring them before the House for immediate action. Now, I do not wish to do anything against the bill. I do not know but that it is correct. I do not assail the bill or the committee that reported it. But it must be known to every member, unless he has been so absorbed in the business in hand as to know nothing of what is passing around him, that the Senate of the United States, of which I speak with all deference and respect, is at least not a rapidly moving body. How long it will take them to pass the bill I do not know. The House is occupying some three or four weeks with it, and we do not manifest a great deal of dignity in the discharge of our duties. Sometimes men who manifest more dignity do not move as fast as we do.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is said that I left this House on a leave of absence. I did, sir; but that has nothing to do with this matter. I returned to this House again in due time. The gentleman seems to think that I do not know what was going on here, because I was not in the House. Let me say to him that I know what is going on here although I am not here, and so do the people of the country, although they are not here.

They know there is formed in this country to-day a whisky ring, as it is called, because the tax on whisky is so high that they can afford to form and keep in operation that ring. They have banded themselves together and have wrenched from the people the taxes upon distilled spirits, and have used them for the manipulation of the very elements against which the country ought to be protected. And the people now demand that that tax shall be reduced so that the great inducement for these frauds may be removed.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] says that the record upon this matter must go to the country. Sir, I want it to go to the country. And if men propose to attack in this way those who differ from them concerning the business of this House, let it also be borne in mind that the people will hold responsible those who will not act in such a way as at once to wrench from the hands of these men the means by which they now despoil the country. I want that to go to the country also.

There is another thing I desire to speak about. It was said by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] that I was the medium by which this resolution was brought before the House. Now, sir, that was at least unkind. I have not called the gentleman the medium of the views of the Committee of Ways and Means. I am not the medium of anything but the wishes of my constituents. I speak and act for them, and I will always do it here and elsewhere. It is for the people I represent that I speak and act. And though I will overlook the remark of the gentleman, I still think it was unkind, and was a remark which should not have been made by a member of his age and experience.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the gentleman will not misunderstand me.

Mr. SHANKS. I do not misunderstand the gentleman.

Mr. SCHENCK. I understood the gentleman to represent a sentiment entertained by a number of persons, and I supposed the gentleman was the medium through which that sentiment was expressed.

Mr. SHANKS. The resolution is the medium of that sentiment, and is clearly expressed.

Mr. SCHENCK. It was not introduced without consultation, I suppose.

Mr. SHANKS. I consulted with my people, and I understand the resolution to express their sentiments.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the Committee of Ways and Means have considered this matter thoroughly, and come to a conclusion as to the best thing that should be done in regard to it, why do they throw themselves back upon their dignity and refuse to act upon the matter again? I understood the chairman of the committee to say that the committee could not—perhaps he said they would not—act upon this measure. Now, I think it is the duty of the committee to act upon any measure this House may direct them to consider. And when they will not do that, then I think it will be highly proper that they should cease to be members of a House whose orders they will not obey. The country will hold those men responsible who throw themselves back on their dignity and say, "We will not act, because our judgment in this matter has not been considered."

Mr. SCHENCK. We do not say that.

Mr. SHANKS. I introduced this resolution in good faith, and will stand by it. I now yield the remainder of my time, except five minutes, to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

THE SPEAKER. There are twenty-two minutes of the gentleman's half hour remaining. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] will be entitled to the floor for seven minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that the debate in this case has gone to the prejudices rather than to the merits of this question. The question of the votes of gentlemen, in conjunction with others, if they vote according to their conscience, I trust will never be brought up. And that we are to be frightened from our propriety because gentlemen of the Democratic party see fit to vote with us is a new party lash which I never understood was put on before.

Mr. SCHENCK made some remark not audible to the reporter.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not care to have a running debate with the gentleman in his seat. As I said, this is a new party lash. Now, I find upon an examination of the record of the last vote that fifty-three Republicans voted with me, and fifty-eight voted with the gentleman from Ohio. The gentleman had to aid him a mutual admiration society of eight members, forming, with himself, what is commonly called "the Committee of Ways and Means," each of whom gets up here and tells us what all the others have done. According to their account there never before was so much work, so much virtue, so much vigilance and devotion to the public interest, as found in that committee.

Now, I did not intend to say one word on this subject, because I know that this committee has, as I have heretofore said, worked well, and nothing is to be said against them; and I reckon them among my most valued friends. When I vote for the postponement of their tax bill I am saying simply that what took them seven months to prepare I do not feel myself competent to deal with in a week; and whoever does has not so high an opinion of the committee as I have.

Now, let us see; they took seven months to hear the case. They worked day and night; they were very vigilant and very diligent; and after they have worked upon this bill seven months, they now propose we shall pass it in ten days. Be it so. Suppose we pass the bill in ten days, it will take one week afterward to engross it. We shall not get this bill through before the 1st day of July, and then it will take a week to engross it. It then goes to the Senate. It will take a week there to get it in print. Then the Senate committee have a right to consider it as long as our Committee of Ways and Means; for there are many hundreds of men who have not got what they wanted before our Committee of Ways and Means, and who will want to be heard before the Senate committee; and they must have a hearing. The bill will not get out of the Senate committee for less than six weeks, though they work day and night, because they cannot do in six weeks, working day and night, so much as the Committee of Ways and Means have done in seven months, working day and night, never sleeping except so much as was simply necessary for personal health. [Laughter.]

Then, what time have we? That brings us into the middle of September. Then the Senate goes to work upon the bill. Having no previous question, the bill, if passed there this session, cannot get through till some time in October or November. What advantage, then, will the country get from this bill this year? Why not, as I proposed to do, postpone this bill, if ever the question can be reached, till the first day of next session, letting it remain in its present position until that time, and then pass it through as fast as we can.

Now, then, a word as to party, to which the chairman of the committee has alluded. We are here on the eve of a presidential election. Nay, we are in a presidential campaign, or ought to be. Let me repeat that, because "I want it," as the phrase is, "to go to the country." We are or ought to be in a campaign, in order to save this country under the men who have fought for it for the past five years. Yet we are kept here doing what? Trying to pass a tax bill which there is not a man in this House believes will be passed this session through both branches. If there is such a one, let him rise and let me see him, "for him have I offended."

Mr. MULLINS, (rising.) Let the gentleman take a good look at me. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. I see the gentleman; and I congratulate the Committee of Ways and Means that they have one faithful man on their side. [Laughter.]

Sir, I might adopt a similar style of argument to that used by the gentleman from Ohio. Suppose I should say to him, "Why, sir, did you not vote with a solid Democratic vote this morning to pay $1,700,000 if not $2,000,000 out of the Treasury to the clerks here in Washington, male and female, rebel and Union?"

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. The gentleman is mistaken there.

Mr. BUTLER. I cannot yield to anybody. Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. The gentleman ought to take back the word "rebel," because the resolution expressly provides against that.

THE SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] declines to yield.

Mr. BUTLER. That resolution provides for twenty per cent. addition to the salaries for all sorts of clerks. Without any opportunity for discussion it was passed through here under the pressure of these galleries filled with clerks, male and female, watching their men. [Laughter.] Under such pressure $2,000,000 of money were voted out of the Treasury to pay clerks, male and female, who are receiving, on the average, higher salaries than are earned by the three learned professions in this country.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I rise to a point of order. I want to know what this discussion has to do with the postponement of the tax bill?

The SPEAKER. The rules were suspended to allow the gentleman from Ohio half an hour, and then half an hour to other gentlemen in reply. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Massachusetts is hardly transgressing the limits to be allowed to the debate under such circumstances.

Mr. BUTLER. It is entirely germane, sir, when we are called upon to sit here in the summer weather, to give up all other occupations, to give up this great presidential campaign, and to give up all the interests of the country for the purpose of raising money to pay these clerks who, again I say, are overpaid, paid more than any of the learned professions in any part of the United States.

Mr. MAYNARD. How did the gentleman vote on the twenty per cent. proposition?

Mr. BUTLER. Against it ever.

Mr. MAYNARD. Then we voted together, and I ask the gentleman to vote with me on this question.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish all of the Committee of Ways and Means could say as much.

Mr. MULLINS. I can say it, although I am not a member of the Committee of Ways and Means. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. The volunteer member of the Committee of Ways and Means, I believe, did vote against it.

I say again the argument put forward is that we must have voted wrongly because Democrats voted with us. I have no doubt the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] voted conscientiously; that is his affair; but the fact that he voted with the Democrats is quite apparent; and in the coming presidential campaign we will have to shoulder and carry that vote of his. I want, if we are going into this campaign, to get through with this session some time or other in order to have an opportunity on the "stump" to explain the gentleman's vote on the twenty per cent. matter.

Now, then, sir, what we on our part desire is this: we want to take these two subjects of taxation, whisky and tobacco, out of this bill now, and pass upon them at once; and we desire to act on these at once and pass them, because it will take until September or late in the fall to pass the bill with them in it. Again, if we should lose this tax bill for want of time to perfect it in both branches, we should lose the benefit of arranging the whisky and tobacco taxes which the country demands.

Why, sir, this whisky tax has fallen from $80,000,000 to $13,000,000, and the difference between $200,000,000, which ought to be collected, and $13,000,000 which is returned, goes into the pockets of speculators, "the whisky ring," which has been too strong for the Government so far, and I will say which I thought, before the vote this morning, was too strong for this House. They want the high tax kept on; and the effect of keeping this bill before the country and before the House and Senate, where it cannot be passed and where but one man has ventured to look us in the face and tell us he believed it could pass, the effect, I say, will be to keep the high tax on whisky and keep alive the "whisky ring."

Let me say to you, gentlemen of the Republican side of this House, if you allow this Congress to adjourn without taking means to bring this whisky ring into subjection to the country you might as well adjourn forever, so far as you are concerned. That is known to every man here who has seen the inner workings of the "whisky ring."

Now, sir, I have a single further observation to make, and then I will give the floor back to my friend from Indiana, [Mr. SHANKS;] and it is this: if the gentlemen of the committee, as they say, cannot draw up and report a bill embracing the sections concerning the tax on tobacco and distilled spirits in less than one week, how can they expect us to discuss and pass the same whisky and tobacco sections in their bill in a week in this House? They say we have just got up to these sections in their bill, and that we can go forward and pass them in a week, but that if we do not the committee cannot even draw up the same sections in a new bill in less than a week. If the committee cannot draw up a bill containing these sections after all their experience, how can this House be expected to discuss amendments and get through with them in a week?

We wish not to be misunderstood or misrepresented in our design. We are attempting here, if we can, to cure two running sores of corruption, to stop two leaks in the public Treasury, and to do it at once. The gentleman from Ohio persists that his bill, as it now is, furnishes the only remedy. He so insists, I fear, out of pride of offspring, out of pride in his work; that there is nothing so good for this purpose as the bill the committee have hatched out after seven months' incubation. Practically, however, it is in effect to say that the tax on whisky and tobacco shall not be reduced this session. If his bill be proceeded with without modification the effect will be that no bill touching whisky or tobacco can be passed. We shall thus be holding on to a bill uselessly and causelessly, and one which no one believes can be passed into a law this session.

Are we ready to do that? And when gentlemen taunt me with the responsibility for opposing this I am quite ready and willing to take it, and so will every Republican here be. Sir, we take it because we think this bill is a useless experiment. We want to do something practical. We on this side of the question have no pride of opinion. We have no love of offspring. We have no mutual scratch-my-back-and-I-will-tickle-your-elbow contrivance to maintain, but we stand directly upon the question of practical legislation, and want to pass what we can pass. We do not want to undertake to pass that which we cannot pass. It is on this proposition that we stand in our support of this resolution. I yield the rest of my time to the gentleman who gave me the floor.

Mr. SHANKS. I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PRUYN. I simply wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that some weeks ago, before the discussion of this measure commenced, I requested the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to introduce a brief bill of the character now contemplated, telling him frankly that I had understood from his own side of the House, and from his own political friends, that they did not believe this bill could be gone through with at this session. We must look at this matter practically and determine, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has said, whether in our judgment the bill now before the House, should it pass this body, can be acted upon by the Senate at this session. If it cannot pass the Senate it is wasting our efforts to go through with it here. Were there sufficient time for the purpose I should be very glad to coöperate in any proper effort to improve the internal revenue system, which is very defective; but I am satisfied that the most we can now hope for is to legislate on the important points mentioned in the resolution.

Mr. SHANKS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I am one of the unfortunate fifty-seven, if so designated, who voted originally for going on with the consideration of this bill; and I feel called upon to avail myself of the courtesy of the gentleman from Indiana to give my reasons for it, for I flatter myself that I do not do anything on this floor or off it without having, as I conceive, a good reason for it. And here, lest I forget it before my five minutes expire, allow me to say that I have no fault to find with the Committee of Ways and Means. I have no antagonism to them whatever. I think they have labored industriously, zealously, and honestly for the perfection of the bill. But I think, like all mortals, they have failed in some instances to bring it to perfection. There are a great many particulars in which the bill might have been improved, as evidence of which I will refer to the fact that after spending seven months in bringing forth this bill they come in here with a quantity of amendments. I will not attempt to number them—themselves proving conclusively that the bill is far from being perfect. But I find no fault on that account; I only cite the fact to show that the bill is very imperfect as it is.

The chairman of the committee stated when this bill was introduced that we could get through it in ten days or two weeks. I knew then, as I know now, that he was mistaken. I have no doubt he thought so, but I was satisfied, from what little experience I have had here, that we could not get half through with it. The fact proves who was right, for we have been engaged nearly three weeks on the bill and have not got half through it yet. We are nearly half through the pages, but remember we have got to go back and consider six pages which we found ourselves unable to act upon with any degree of certainty, and therefore passed them over.

Mr. SCHENCK here made a remark inaudible to the reporter.

Mr. PRICE. Sir, I am not afraid to go to the country on my vote. I may be wrong in the votes I give, but being afraid to go to the country is not one of my failings; and it is not worth while to try to scare me.

Mr. SCHENCK. I suppose the gentleman would like to be right as to his facts.

Mr. PRICE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SCHENCK. The bill was taken up, and then various other matters interfered with it, so that instead of being engaged on it nearly three weeks it has not had more than five full days' consideration.

Mr. PRICE. I do not think any of the gentlemen who voted with the fifty-seven in this case feel very much scared about this going to the country, for it was a self-evident fact to all men inside of this Hall, and outside of it, too, that we could not get the bill through at any time during the present session. The question of whisky and tobacco must be considered. We must have something in reference to that matter to go to the country or we shall go home condemned by every honest Republican and Democrat between the Atlantic and the Pacific; and it is for the very reason that we must have that that we are now in favor of postponing this bill and advocating the resolution. Let us take up the matter of the tax on whisky and tobacco and pass something upon that, and after that is done, if we have time, we can take up the balance of the bill and finish it.

We have no fault to find with the bill, or with the Committee of Ways and Means, but it is a question of expediency whether we shall do something in reference to whisky and tobacco, or do nothing at this session. That is why the men who are advocating this resolution take the ground they do. They may be mistaken, but they are honest in it, and their judgment may possibly approach as near to perfection as that of those by whom they are opposed. They do not claim to be perfect, but they say that they have a right to their opinions on this floor, and they think they have the good of the country as much at heart as the Committee of Ways and Means, and no more. We have no fault to find with the committee, but it is a matter of policy and prudence whether we shall take up this matter and act upon it and give it to the country. And let me remind the House that we cannot hope to have the bill passed in less than three months if we go through with the whole bill, when, if we take up the whisky and tobacco provisions, we may have a bill in less than three weeks, or less than one week, and let it go to the country, and thus, if possible, defeat these infamous swindlers of the public known as the whisky ring of the country. That is why we advocate the resolution, and for no other reason in the world. We want to go before the country and on the record in a proper manner.

The SPEAKER. The time allowed for debate has expired, and the question is upon ordering the main question to be now put, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to insert "mineral oils" in the resolution.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope that by unanimous consent the call of the yeas and nays will be dispensed with.

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir; I want the yeas and nays on ordering a vote on this question.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 79, nays 63, not voting 47; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Axtell, Barnes, Beaman, Beck, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boyer, Buckland, Burr, Butler, Cary, Covode, Dawes, Delano, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eldridge, Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Halsey, Harding, Hawkins, Holman, Hotchkiss, Hulburd, Humphrey, Johnson, Julian, Kelsey, Kitchen, Knott, Kuntz, Ladin, Loughbridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, McCormick, Mercer, Moore, Myers, Newcomb, Nunn, Pike, Plants, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Spalding, Starkweather, Stewart, Stone, Taber, Thomas, Lawrence S. Washburn, William B. Washburn, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—47.

So the main-question was ordered.

The question was upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. MAYNARD. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 74, nays 63, not voting 52; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Axtell, Barnes, Beaman, Beck, Benjamin, Blaine, Blair, Boyer, Buckland, Burr, Butler, Cary, Dawes, Delano, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eldridge, Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Halsey, Harding, Hawkins, Holman, Hotchkiss, Hulburd, Humphrey, Johnson, Julian, Kelsey, Kitchen, Knott, Kuntz, Ladin, Loughbridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, McCormick, Mercer, Moore, Newcomb, Nunn, Pike, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Spalding, Stewart, Stone, Taber, Thomas, Lawrence S. NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beatty, Benton, Boutwell, Cake, Churchill, Reader W. Washburn, William B. Washburn, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—37.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. SHANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GREAT AND LITTLE OSAGE INDIANS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of the Interior, made in reply to a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives on the 13th instant. The treaty recently concluded with the Great and Little Osage Indians, to which the accompanying report refers, was submitted to the Senate prior to the receipt of the resolution of the House upon the subject.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 15, 1868.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I move that the message and accompanying document be printed, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I also move that the Committee on Indian Affairs have leave to report upon this subject at any time, not within the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent.

Mr. SCHENCK. I object.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. SCHENCK. I want to offer a resolution, and when the gentleman hears it he will understand why I object.

The SPEAKER. The President's message upon the subject being before the House, any motion growing out of it is naturally in order. But if the floor passes away from the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. CLARKE,] the next business in order will be the motion to suspend the rules, submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] on Monday last.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House to Senate bill No. 184, granting a pension to Mrs. Ann Corcoran, and asked a committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill; and announced that Mr. VAN WINKLE, Mr. TRUMBULL, and Mr. EDMUNDS had been appointed the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed the following bills, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 448) to refund duties erroneously exacted in certain cases; and

An act (S. No. 469) confirming the title to a tract of land in Burlington, Iowa.

MRS. ANN CORCORAN.

The request of the Senate for a committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon Senate bill No. 184, granting a pension to Mrs. Ann Corcoran, was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

The Speaker subsequently appointed Mr. VAN AERNAM, Mr. MILLER, and Mr. BURR, as the conferees on the part of the House.

ELECTION CONTEST—CHAVES VS. CLEVER.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House additional evidence in the contested-election case of Chaves vs. CLEVER, New Mexico; which was referred to the Committee of Elections, and ordered to be printed.

INTERNAL TAX BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for consideration at this time:

Resolved, That after the report of a tax bill by the Committee of Ways and Means, in pursuance of the order just passed, no other business shall be in order but the consideration of the bill so reported by said committee except reports from the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this will cut out the morning hour entirely. Is there objection?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to suspend the rules to introduce the resolution.

Mr. ELIOT. I must object to that at this time.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, is it not in order to move to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. It will be if the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CLARKE] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] both surrender the floor.

GREAT AND LITTLE OSAGE INDIANS.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw my objection to the motion of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. CLARKE.]

The SPEAKER. If there is no further objection it will be ordered that the Committee on Indian Affairs have authority to report upon the question of the treaty with the Osage Indians at any time outside of the morning hour.

There was no objection.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The SPEAKER. On last Monday night, just before the adjournment of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of discharging the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the river and harbor bill, and ordering that the bill be at once considered in the House. That is now the pending motion.

Mr. ELIOT. I will modify my motion so as to assign the bill for consideration on Thursday next after the morning hour.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the gentleman to name either an earlier or a later time.

Mr. ELIOT. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is under the impression that the Committee of Ways and Means will be prepared to report the tax bill by Thursday, I have personally no sort of objection to taking up the river and harbor bill to-morrow, and disposing of it in season to clear the way for the tax bill.

Several MEMBERS. Take up your bill to-morrow.

Mr. BLAINE. Will that cut off the special order for Wednesday—the bill to protect American commerce?

The SPEAKER. It will not. That bill, having been made a special order by unanimous consent, will have priority over all other orders.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I do not object.

Mr. DAWES. I do not want to lose my right to call up the question of privilege, the bill to admit R. R. Butler to a seat.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that when special orders are being assigned after the morning hour questions of privilege should be called up immediately after the reading of the Journal. If there is no objection it will be ordered that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the river and harbor bill, and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole to-morrow after the morning hour.

There was no objection.

Mr. ELIOT. I move to reconsider the vote by which the order was just made in regard to the river and harbor bill; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL TAX BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I again ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That after the report of a tax bill by the Committee of Ways and Means, in pursuance of the order just passed, no other business shall be in order but the consideration of the bill so reported by said committee except reports from the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

Mr. SPALDING. Does that cut off appropriation bills?

The SPEAKER. It cuts off all other business than the tax bill.

Mr. SPALDING. Then I object.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move, then, to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing and adopting the resolution just read.

The motion was agreed to.

So the resolution was introduced and adopted. Mr. ALLISON moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. Gentlemen ask how soon a bill of that kind can be reported. That depends on circumstances, but mostly on the interpretation of the resolution. We are to report, so the resolution says, on the revision of the taxes. If we are only to report what shall be the tax on distilled spirits and what on tobacco, we will be able to report very soon indeed. If we are to retain all the machinery provided for the collection of the tax and all those portions of the bill dovetailed together giving it unity, I do not know how long it will take. Inquire, therefore, of gentlemen wiser than myself what interpretation they put upon this resolution? It only directs the revision of the taxes. I wish to know whether we are to go into the machinery for the collection of the taxes, whether we are to introduce the necessary provisions which we have already reported.

Mr. DAWES. The House has confidence that the committee will report such measures and such tax on whisky and tobacco as may be required.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask in good faith to have the interpretation of this resolution settled. I find members of the Committee of Ways and Means are disagreed to some extent as to what the resolution at last means. I ask that the resolution be again read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That does not bring the resolution again before the House?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. SCHENCK. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask when the Committee of Ways and Means report a bill under that resolution the members of the House will stay here and help us to get it through. When we had the other bill before us the members who voted to-day to set it aside left us by their absence without a quorum in Committee of the Whole, and thus delayed action.

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman does not refer to me, for I was always in attendance.

Mr. SCHENCK. I believe the gentleman attended faithfully.

Mr. HARDING. I was always present in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman need not purge himself, I will give him a certificate. Both of those gentlemen having been here are as well aware of the fact as I am that while they and I and others have been here we have been without a quorum to attend to this business; and we were without a quorum because of the absence of many of those who voted this morning to send this bill back to the committee.

Mr. HARDING. I understand the gentleman to say he is in favor of the reduction of the tax on whisky.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think the committee will be inclined to go for it.

Mr. HARDING. I hope the committee will not procrastinate, so there may be an end to the reign of the "whisky ring."

Mr. LOGAN. I hope we will have no more insinuations, and that this debate, which is entirely out of order, will be brought to a close.

The SPEAKER. The debate is not in order.

Mr. SCHENCK. I thought I was in order. The House suspended the rules for the introduction of my resolution to make the bill, when reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, the special order until disposed of. In view of that I wish also to have the order of the House instructing the committee more definite. It is now indefinite, and gives rise to various interpretations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's resolution was adopted..

CONTESTED ELECTIONS IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer the following resolution; and if I cannot have unanimous consent to offer it I will move to suspend the rules.

Resolved, That the rules be suspended, and Senate bill No. 534 be taken from the Speaker's table for action at this time; and after twenty minutes' debate on each side the vote shall be taken on the passage of the bill without any dilatory motions whatever."

Mr. ELDRIDGE. What is that bill?

The SPEAKER. It is the Senate bill relating to contested elections in the city of Washington.

Mr. BOYER. I object.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It is an outrage to attempt to pass this bill, allowing only twenty minutes for debate.

Mr. SCHENCK. I insist on my resolution for the suspension of the rules for the purpose indicated.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 103, nays 27, not voting 59; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Buckland, Butler, Calkins, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Delano, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eggleston, Eli, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Gravelly, Harding, Hawkins, Higby, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Judd, Julian, Kelsey, Kitchen, Kootz, Ladin, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Morrill, Mullins, Myers, Newcomb, Nunn, O'Neill, Peters, Pike, Plants, Polley, Pomeroy, Price, Raum, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Seelye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Spalding, Aaron F. Stevens, Stokes, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, and William Williams—103.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Axtell, Barnes, Beck, Boyer, Burr, Cary, Eldridge, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Hotchkiss, Humphrey, Johnson, Knott, McCormick, Nicklack, Phelps, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Stewart, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Trump, and Woodward—27.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Arnell, Banks, Barnum, Bromwell, Brooks, Broomall, Chandler, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Eckley, Finney, Fox, Getz, Griswold, Haight, Halsey, Hill, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hunter, Jones, Kelley, Kerr, Ketcham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Marshall, McCullough, Moorhead, Morrissey, Mungen, Nicholson, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Poland, Robertson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Smith, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, John Trimble, Van Auker, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—59.

So (two thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was before the House, and was read a first and second time.

The bill was reported. It provides that whenever any person has received or shall hereafter receive a certificate from the register of the city of Washington, based upon satisfactory evidence furnished by the commissioners of election, notifying him of his election to any elective office in said city, the person receiving such notification shall be entitled to enter upon the discharge of the duties of his office, and the certificate of the register shall be prima facie evidence of his election to and right to discharge the duties of the office.

The second section provides that any person who shall hinder or obstruct a person holding the certificate of election mentioned in the foregoing section from entering upon or discharging the duties of his office, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof, in any court of competent jurisdiction, shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000, or be imprisoned in the county jail not exceeding six months, or both, in the discretion of the court.

The third section proposes to give the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or any judge thereof, jurisdiction to enforce, by mandamus or otherwise, the right of any person holding the certificate mentioned in the first section.

Under the fourth section any person who claims, or shall hereafter claim, to be elected to any elective office in Washington city may commence proceedings before the supreme court of the District of Columbia, by petition setting forth the facts upon which he relies, and shall serve a copy on the incumbent or person who has received the certificate of election; and the person so served is to make answer to the petition within five days; and the court is thereupon to try the rights of the parties to the office in a summary manner; and for that purpose a special session is to be called and held whenever necessary for the purposes of such trial; and the decision of the court in any case so brought before it is to be final and conclusive. And when the legal organization of the board of aldermen or board of common council shall be delayed on account of any contest in relation to the election of any member of either of said boards, the mayor of said city is hereby authorized to make temporary appointments of all subordinate officers, whose appointment or election is authorized by the said mayor and members of said boards under existing laws, to continue until said boards shall be legally organized.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. On that I call the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain the motion. By the resolution suspending the rules the House has ordered after twenty minutes' debate on each side that the vote shall be taken on the passage of the bill, without any dilatory motion whatever.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The motion to lay on the table is not a dilatory motion. The Speaker has so held.

The SPEAKER. The order of the House is precisely the reverse, however, to-day. This order is not only "without any dilatory motion whatever," but it says that after twenty minutes' debate on each side the House shall take a vote on the passage of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Is it not in the power of the House to vote the bill down—to kill it?

The SPEAKER. It is; by rejecting it.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, I want to take a summary method of doing it, by laying it on the table.

The SPEAKER. The House has ordered, under a suspension of the rules, that after twenty minutes' speeches on each side the vote shall be taken on the passage of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. When was that order made?

The SPEAKER. Just now, under a suspension of the rules, by a vote of yeas 103, nays 27.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand that the rules were suspended to bring the bill before the House, but that does not pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. It does not pass the bill, of course.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have not heard any resolution put that we shall have twenty minutes' speaking on each side.

The SPEAKER. That is now to commence.

Mr. ROBINSON. By what order?

The SPEAKER. Under this order which the Chair will read.

Mr. ROBINSON. The House simply suspended the rules that the bill might be brought up.

The SPEAKER. That is not a correct statement. The resolution adopted by the House was as follows:

Resolved, That the rules be suspended, and Senate bill No. 534 be taken from the Speaker's table for action at this time, and after twenty minutes' debate on each side the vote shall be taken on the passage of the bill without any dilatory motions whatsoever.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Speaker will excuse me; I was mistaken.

Mr. SCHENCK. Gentlemen will observe that the charter under which we are doing business just now is the resolution just passed. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON. It is not the usual way, and I was mistaken.

Mr. SCHENCK. It allows twenty minutes' debate to each side. That is not very much better than putting the previous question on the bill, I admit, but it does afford gentlemen on either side an opportunity through some one or more of their number to state the reasons why they will vote for or against the bill. That is all.

Mr. BOYER. I do think twenty minutes' time is entirely inadequate for the discussion of such a measure as this.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is too late now to reconsider that matter.

Mr. BOYER. I make an appeal to the gentleman and to the House to allow longer time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I should have finished by this time, if the gentleman had not interrupted me, and given way to him.

At present the law does not provide any way for trying cases of contested elections. The Senate has passed and sent to us a bill which supplies that omission. So far as the mayor of this city is concerned, I believe that whatever dispute may have occurred in relation to his being inducted into office all are agreed that he at least was elected by a small majority. So far as the members of the two boards constituting the council of the city (its legislative department) are concerned, there is a dispute in at least one of the wards, and there are two sets of claimants. In consequence of this there has been an organization or attempt at organization by both, and each has recognized a different mayor, one the mayor-elect and the other an ad interim, whom they have created for the occasion. This condition of things, although people at a distance may regard it as rather a "tempest in a tea-pot," considering the excitement that it has occasioned here in this city, is yet very serious, and I am assured by more than one gentleman who from his position ought to know and understand the subject well, that if Congress stands by and permits this anomalous condition of things to continue it will result probably in violence before the end of the week, such being the threats made and such the temper that is being excited.

Now, I regard it as a thing not for a moment to be consented to that we, acting as the Legislature of this District and city, should sit here and permit such a condition of things to continue when we can apply a remedy. I have been anxious, therefore, that the bill from the Senate which remits this subject to the supreme court of the District should not only become a law, but that by our concurrence in it, with or without amendment, as the case may be, it should become a law so soon as to prevent this condition of things from ripening into further or greater troubles.

Without going into the details of this bill, these are the reasons why I will support it, being satisfied with its provisions in the main.

Now, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to give any portion of the time I control to gentlemen on the other side, so that they can give their reasons for not supporting the bill.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think it proper that the debate on the other side should be concluded before we take our twenty minutes.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well. I have stated the reasons which are sufficient to control my vote for this bill. I will now yield the floor to any gentleman who may get it. I do not suppose that we are compelled to occupy the entire twenty minutes allowed for this side.

No one arising to speak in favor of the bill, The SPEAKER said: The debate in favor of the passage of the bill is now closed.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to say here that the object of this bill is to accomplish a political result which I deem unworthy of any political party, certainly of the now dominant party, in a country like ours.

Some time ago a bill was passed through this House in reference to the charter of the city of Washington. The dominant party, then supposing that they were in danger of losing the mayoralty of this city, changed the old mode of appointing and electing every officer in this city, took that power away from the mayor and gave it to the joint convention of council and aldermen. The election came on. Admitting the statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to be correct, their candidate for mayor was unexpectedly elected, while, also unexpectedly to them, the two branches of the common council were carried by the white people of the district, who were aided by the soldier, against the black people of the District. It now becomes necessary to traverse the whole mode of electing and appointing officers, which results from the bill lately passed, and to change it so that by this procedure the control of the two branches of the common council shall be handed over to the black people of this District.

This bill is a proposition to do nothing more or less than to throw out three white candidates for the council in one ward and put in their places three white representatives of the negroes in that ward. That is the sole issue. I say again, that I have never known any party, in any part of the country, who stooped so low to do that which was wrong, to profit by it; and I do not believe they will profit by it in this case. I believe as they were defeated and overthrown under the charter which they thought it necessary to pass, in order to put down the white people of this District, so will they fail again.

In the particular ward to which I have referred they have undertaken to deprive the soldiers of the right to vote, to which they were entitled quite as much as were the negroes who were brought in and made voters in this District after a residence of fifteen days.

However, no effort of mine can stop the action now proposed. My province is only to expose the proposition and the purpose of it. I am surprised that gentlemen on the other side should undertake to act in this way. They are undertaking to give the black people of this District the control over the white people of the District. That is really the issue involved in the passage of this bill.

For one, I shall content myself with casting my vote against this measure in every shape and form. I now yield to my colleague, [Mr. BOYER.]

Mr. BOYER. Mr. Speaker, we seem to have arrived at that stage of the legislation of Congress when it is in vain to appeal to any principle of justice or fairness, or to advocate any cause because it is founded upon existing law, unless at the same time it can be demonstrated that it is for the interest of the party in power, and will serve to perpetuate its rule. It is the same whether the proposition be the reconstruction of a State, or the election of mayor and councilmen of a city.

I have not time to discuss the questions involved in this measure. I have not time to read the law as it stands upon the statute-book, a law which was framed by this Congress for its own purpose, and intended to regulate the municipal elections of the city of Washington, and which, because it does not now operate as it was supposed it would, so as to continue the power of the Republican party in this city, it is proposed to change, after the election which it is to affect has actually taken place, and to direct that certificates of election shall be given to those who failed to receive a majority of the votes at the polls.

By the act of Congress lately passed there were five judges of election provided for the city of Washington, to be appointed by the supreme court of the District. Those judges were to attend to the registration of voters, and to decide who was a legal voter within the meaning of the act of Congress. These judges of election were actually appointed by the supreme court of the District. They performed their duties. Lists of registration were made out and perfected. Another act of Congress subsequently passed provided that there should be commissioners of election appointed by the same court, who were to receive the ballots cast by the persons whose names had been entered by the judges of election upon the lists of registration. These commissioners were ministerial officers merely. By the express provisions of the law they are to decide, not upon the qualifications of voters, but only upon their identity; and this is all in fact that in the late election the commissioners of election undertook to perform. In the fifth ward of this city it so happened that these commissioners of election in pursuance of their duty returned, as it was provided by law that they should do, that certain individuals who had received a majority of the votes cast were elected to the common council. It happened that they were not Radicals, as was expected, and hence the trouble. The register of the city, who under the law has nothing to do but simply to make a record of the returns and to notify the persons elected—mere ministerial acts—undertook to withhold the notice from certain persons of those who were returned in the first instance by the commissioners of election as having been legally elected to the council. It is true that after the performance of that act, the commissioners of election were induced to make a supplemental return; but when they did that they were functi officio, without any further power and incompetent to revoke the return which they had previously made according to the express provisions of the law. The law further provides, that upon returns being so made, the mayor of the city shall proclaim the persons so returned elected. That was done in this instance. Yet those gentlemen thus elected and so returned and proclaimed as elected were denied the right to take their seats at the council board. And now, it being evident that there is no law for such a proceeding, this shameless retroactive measure has been introduced into the Senate, passed there, and is now before this House, for the purpose of making the certificate of the register, who before had no judicial powers, the prima facie evidence of election, thus changing the law from what it was when the election took place for the mere purpose of enabling the Republican party to have a majority of councilmen at the board where they had been unexpectedly left in a minority by the result of the election.

Mr. NIBLACK. I trust the gentleman will allow me a single inquiry. I have not had an opportunity of examining this bill since it was passed by the Senate; but I understand that as to the question of a prima facie case, it creates one rule with reference to the mayor, and another with reference to the members of the council. I wish to inquire whether that is the fact?

Mr. BOYER. It is.

Mr. NIBLACK. And being so, does not that operate in each case in favor of the Republican candidates?

Mr. BOYER. Undoubtedly it does. The design is patent upon the very face of the bill. I wish I had time to ventilate it before this House and before the country. It was well for the gentlemen on the other side to restrict the debate on this side of the House to twenty minutes. It is their habit thus to restrict debate when the measure which they introduce and undertake to force through this House will not bear the test of honest, fair discussion.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to ask the gentleman one question. Who, under the existing law, gives the certificates to the parties claiming to be elected?

Mr. BOYER. Under the existing law it is provided that the mayor shall proclaim who are elected according to the returns of the commissioners of election; and that was done in this instance. The register has nothing more to do with it than to perform the simple ministerial act of notifying the persons who are elected; and whether he notifies them or not under the law it cannot make one particle of difference, nor affect in the slightest degree the validity of the election of those who are returned as the elected officers by the commissioners, and who are proclaimed to be so elected and returned by the mayor.

Mr. DAWES. I was simply inquiring who, under the existing law, gives the certificates.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman from Massachusetts ought not take up the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOYER] when it is so limited.

Mr. BOYER. No, sir; I cannot yield further. The gentlemen are welcome to all the capital they can make by the passage of this measure. If we cannot discuss it here, we can take the opportunity to discuss it before the country. We shall show that those whose votes were thrown out were soldiers who resided here one year, and had been legally registered according to the law as it existed at the time. I should like to ask how it was known that their votes were cast for the conservative candidates? I should like to know upon what law or correct principle these men undertake to decide that the votes thus cast were on one side or the other? What official evidence had they? What testimony did they take? What judicial tribunal of any kind was the case ever before?

Mr. MAYNARD. As the gentleman asks for information—

Mr. BOYER. I cannot yield. The reply would be, I suppose, that the commissioners of election undertook to mark the ballots which were voted by these soldiers, so their ballots could afterward be recognized in the count. I should like to know upon what correct principle that is to be allowed in any community where it is provided by law that the election shall be by ballot? The sanctity of the election by ballot depends on its privacy. No election officer or any other man in the community has the right to look inside of a citizen's ballot to find out how he voted. He has no more right to do that than to put his hand into the pocket of the voter and take from it his pocket-book. Doubtless, when the next municipal election in Washington takes place, this Congress, if the majority in it should remain as it is, will invent some new dodges for the emergency, and set aside the law which they are now making with as little scruple as they dispose of that which they enacted a few months ago, if by so doing they can help their own friends into office.

I have been informed that the votes of over a hundred soldiers were thrown out of the ballot-box to accomplish the object in this case. All these have, without any judicial investigation, been deducted from the votes polled for the Conservative candidates. Has it come to this that the presumption is that the enlisted soldier when he goes to the polls votes the Democratic ticket? If that be so on that issue I should rejoice to go before the country. Let the dusky sons of Africa vote the Republican ticket. If we have the white soldiers of the country to vote ours, we shall be content with this exchange, and we do not mean to be always defrauded.

I am sorry I must discuss this measure in this desultory way. If I had time I should prefer to review with more deliberation the law as it stands, and expose more at length the injustice, the fraud, and the outrage of this bill upon the rights of the voters of this city. As it is we have little else to do upon this occasion than to enter our protest against this iniquitous measure, and put ourselves upon record against it by our votes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. NIBLACK demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 94, nays 25, not voting 70; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call,

Mr. RAUM stated that he was paired with his colleague, [Mr. MARSHALL.]

The result having been announced as above recorded.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw it.

PAYMENT OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. PAINE, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House a statement of the number of additional bounties paid under the act of July 28, 1866, by the paymaster general during each month since January 1, 1863, to claimants from the respective States and Territories.

Mr. PAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXTRA PAY OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

Mr. BINGHAM. I rise to a privileged motion. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House passed the joint resolution (H. R. No. 291) giving additional pay to certain employes in the civil service of the Government at Washington.

REMOVAL OF THE CAPITAL.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas it is obvious that a disloyal element exists in the city of Washington, which is adverse to the authority of the Congress of the United States, and that a large portion of the citizens thereof have determined to set the laws of Congress at defiance, and to shield and defend conspirators and assassins, to menace and insult the representatives of the people assembled to make laws for the government of the nation; and whereas a great portion of the citizens of said city are at the present time, in direct violation of law and in defiance of the authority of Congress, attempting by revolutionary measures to overthrow the legally constituted authorities thereof by preventing said authorities from the due exercise of their legal functions, which proceedings are calculated and intended to produce riots and bloodshed, and render the city undesirable as a residence, and an unsafe and unfit place for Congress to assemble; and whereas it is of the highest importance that the capital of the nation and the archives of the Government should be in a place wholly secure from foreign invasion; and whereas it is of the greatest consequence that the seat of Government should be easily accessible by many lines of railway, and should be located in a populous region and a rich and highly cultivated country, and where obstructions to access and free communications are not interposed by the hostile legislation of neighboring States:

Be it resolved, That a committee of five members be appointed by the Speaker to inquire into the propriety and expediency of removing the seat of the General Government from said city of Washington to a point near the geographical center of the Republic, and that said committee be authorized at any time to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. BOYER. I object to the introduction; it is a gross slander on this community.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is not the question debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I was about to say I thought it was a foul slander on the people of this District.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BOYER. It is utterly without foundation in truth.

Mr. LOGAN. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is not understood that the adoption of the motion will carry the resolution also.

The SPEAKER. It does not. It is a motion to allow the resolution to be offered at the present time.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will it be in order if the motion prevails to discuss it?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] will then be entitled to the floor subject to the hour rule.

Mr. BOYER. Is it in order to move to lay it on the table?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

The question was taken on suspending the rules; and there were—yeas 43, nays 67, not voting 79; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, James M. Ashley, Beatty, Benjamin, Butler, Cake, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Covode, Cullom, Donnelly, Ela, Ferriss, Ferry, Gravely, Harding, Higby, Hopkins, Judd, Julian, Kelsey, Loan, Logan, McClurg, Mercer, Moore, Morrell, Mullins, Paine, Pike, Price, Sawyer, Shanks, Taffe, Upson, Robert T. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Baldwin, Barnum, Benton, Blaine, Blair, Bromwell, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Chanler, Cook, Cornell, Dixon, Dodge, Eckley, Eggleston, Finney, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Halsey, Hill, Hooper, Asabel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hunter, Johnson, Jones, Kelley, Kerr, Ketcham, Kitchen, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loughbridge, Lynch, Marshall, McCullough, Moorhead, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Nicholson, Nunn, Orth, Perham, Phelps, Plants, Poland, Raum, Robertson, Ross, Scofield, Selye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, John Trimble, Van Anken, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—79.

So (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. BUTLER obtained the floor.

TAX ON MINERAL OIL.

Mr. SCOFIELD. With the permission of the gentleman from Massachusetts, I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be authorized to include in such new tax bill as they may report the subject of mineral oil.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to move a suspension of the rule?

Mr. BUTLER. I will, but not to have the yeas and nays called on it.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to suspend the rules to enable me to offer the resolution.

The question was taken; and two-thirds not voting in favor thereof, the rules were not suspended.

INDIAN COMMISSION APPROPRIATION.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1218) appropriating money to sustain the Indian commission, and to carry out treaties made thereby, and the same be considered in the House now.

The question was taken; and two thirds voting in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was brought before the House for action, the question being on ordering it to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. BUTLER. I only desire to state to the House that this appropriation bill is for the purpose of enabling the Indian commission under General Sherman to carry out the engagements they are now making with Indians.

in settling hostile demonstrations. The bill is reported upon the request of the commission by special messenger, and also by telegrams to both Houses. I trust there will be no objection to the bill, as there was none in the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WALD. How much money does the bill appropriate?

Mr. BUTLER. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

The bill was read. It appropriates $150,000 for the purpose of carrying out treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes and defraying expenses and disbursements made by the commission authorized by the act of July 20, 1867, entitled "An act to establish peace with certain hostile Indian tribes during the year 1868;" the money to be expended under the direction of the commission.

Mr. BUTLER. I move the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BUTLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMERICAN PRISONERS IN GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. ROBINSON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States is hereby requested by this House to take such measures as shall appear proper to secure the release from imprisonment of Messrs. Warren and Costello, convicted and sentenced in Great Britain for words and acts spoken and done in this country, by ignoring our naturalization laws, and to take such other measures as will secure their return to our flag with such ceremonies as are appropriate to the occasion.

MURDERS IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move to suspend the rules to enable me to offer the following preamble and resolutions:

Whereas information, regarded as reliable, has been received that Solomon Dill, of Camden, South Carolina, late a member of the constitutional convention in said State, and a member-elect to the Legislature, together with two colored men, citizens of the United States, were brutally murdered on the night of the 6th instant, at the residence of said Dill, for no other reason than their devotion to the Union and the Government; and whereas in pursuance of the same system of organized assassination Mr. W. I. Mixon, school commissioner-elect for Barnwell county, North Carolina, was also recently assaulted by armed desperadoes and dangerously, if not mortally wounded: Therefore,

Resolved, (as the sense of this House,) That General R. K. Scott, the Governor-elect, should at once take the most active measures for the arrest of the said assassins and murderers, and to that end he is requested to offer a reward of $10,000 for their prompt apprehension.

Resolved further, (as the sense of this House,) That it is the duty of the general commanding of said district to apprehend and place in close custody all well known desperadoes residing in the vicinity where said murders were committed, as a measure necessary to aid in revealing the murderers and to check the recurrence of such acts in the future.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. CAKE: A memorial of Thomas B. Bancroft and others, citizens of Ashland, Schuylkill county, Pennsylvania, complaining of the inadequacy of customs duties to protect the productive interests of the country, and praying for the reconsideration and passage of the general tariff bill which failed in the Thirty Ninth Congress.

By Mr. CARY: A petition from the merchants and grocers of the city of Memphis, Tennessee, protesting against any change in the existing tariff on imported sugar.

By Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts: The petition of James H. Beal and others, presidents and directors of national banks, in favor of creating the office of United States sealer, for the purpose of sealing scales and weights used in national banks, navy-yards, custom-houses, &c.

By Mr. JULIAN: The petitions of numerous citizens of Iowa and Missouri, praying a grant of land to aid in constructing the Iowa and Missouri State line railroad.

By Mr. MORRELL: The petition of R. B. Myers and 39 others, citizens of Conneautville, Crawford county, Pennsylvania, complaining of the depression of industry, and praying for such increase of protective duties as will revive manufactures and restore prosperity to the country.

Also, the petition of 44 farmers and citizens of Oneida township, Huntingdon county, Pennsylvania, praying for increase of protective duties for the benefit of manufacturing industry.

Also, the petition of John Palmer and 205 others, workers in coal at Dudley, Huntingdon county, Pennsylvania, representing that their industry is greatly depressed and many of their trade out of employment, and praying for such additional protective duties as will relieve their distress and aid them in the unequal contest with the underpaid labor of Europe.

Also, the petition of 3 manufacturing firms of Mifflin county, Pennsylvania, employing, when in full operation, 45 workmen, now employing 26 workmen, signed also by citizens of said county, complaining of the insufficiency of customs duties to protect the industry of this country against the cheaper capital and labor of foreign countries, and praying that Congress will resume consideration of the tariff bill as passed by the Senate, which failed in the House March, 1867, and enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

Also, the petition of iron manufacturers of Huntingdon county, Pennsylvania, employing, when in full operation, 400 workmen, now employing 137 workmen, signed also by 75 citizens of said county, setting forth that the industry of the country is paralyzed for want of efficient protection against the cheaper capital and labor of foreign countries, and praying that Congress will resume consideration of the tariff bill, as passed by the Senate, which failed in the House March, 1867, and enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

Also, the petition of Reynold & Moorhead, manufacturers of iron at Clarion, Pennsylvania, setting forth that they employ when in full operation 280 workmen, and have now but 160, complaining of the suffering condition of the productive interests of the country, and the paralysis of its industry, resulting from the want of efficient protection against the cheaper capital and labor of foreign countries; and praying that Congress will resume consideration of the tariff bill, as passed by the Senate, which failed in the House March, 1867, for want of time, and enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

Also, the petition of 23 manufacturing companies and firms of Blair county, Pennsylvania, employing, when in full operation, 1,536 workmen, now employing 951 workmen, setting forth that customs duties, which were sufficient under a high gold premium, have become wholly inadequate to protect the industry of this country against the cheaper capital and labor of foreign countries, and in prospect of a continued decline in gold must shortly prove ruinous; that much of the distress now prevalent, and daily increasing, would be relieved by the legislation suggested in Special Commissioner Wells's report of last year, as perfected in the tariff bill which failed in the House March, 1867, for want of time; and praying that Congress will resume consideration of that measure, and enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

By Mr. NIBLACK: A memorial of A. J. Wells and sundry others, citizens of Indiana, praying the establishment of a post route from

By Mr. RANDALL: The petition of Henry B. Ashmead, S. C. Collins, W. Harvey Miller, King & Baird, and 124 others, printers of Philadelphia, representing that the productive interests of the country are suffering and its industry paralyzed for want of efficient protection against the cheaper labor and capital of foreign countries; that much of the distress now prevalent and increasing daily would be relieved by the legislation suggested in Special Commissioner Wells's report of last year, and perfected in the tariff bill as passed by the Senate, which failed in the House of Representatives March, 1867, for want of time; and praying that Congress will resume consideration of that measure and enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

Also, the petition of 76 employes of Sherman & Co., printers of Philadelphia, to the same effect.

Also, the petition of Moore & Simpson, D. Rodney King, Lewis S. Moore, and others, business men of Philadelphia, to the same effect.

Also, a memorial of Shields & Brother, G. W. Huntzinger, James A. Needles, Horace H. Soule, Samuel Sems, W. E. S. Baker, and 91 others, manufacturers, coal-miners, and shippers, and business men of Philadelphia, complaining of the paralysis of productive industry; and praying that Congress will resume consideration of the tariff bill which failed in the House of Representatives March, 1867, and enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

By Mr. TAFTE: The petition of O. P. Mason and 1,000 others, citizens of Nebraska, praying the passage of the bill pending in Congress to grant aid in the construction of the Midland Pacific railway, in the State of Nebraska.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, JUNE 16, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. A. D. GUILLETTE, D. D.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

Smithsonian Institution, on the influences of the Washington city canal on the health of the population of the city; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 465) for the erection of school-houses and the maintenance of schools in the District of Columbia outside of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, instruct me to report the same back and ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. The Committee on Appropriations will take notice of the intention, if it is so desired, to move this on the miscellaneous appropriation bill.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 141) requiring the Special Commissioner of the Revenue to act as superintendent of the Bureau of Statistics in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States, communicating a report from the Secretary of State, in relation to recent events in the empire of Japan, moved that it be printed; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Stephen G. Montano, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 553) to pay Stephen G. Montano, a citizen of Peru, an unpaid balance of money awarded to him by the mixed commission authorized by the convention of January 12, 1863, between the United States and Peru. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 146) authorizing the sale of certain bonds belonging to the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, and the adjustment and payment of certain claims against them; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. FERRY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 147) for the relief of Jonathan S. Turner; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 554) to promote commerce among the States and to cheapen transportation of the mails and military and naval stores; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SHERMAN. In regard to the reference of that bill, I have consulted some members of the Committee on Commerce, to whom some might suppose it should properly go, or to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. As the bill is a very important one, proposing to construct railroads from the city of Washington in different directions, and as there is a great deal of dispute about the right to do so, I will move that it be referred to a select committee; I do not expect any action upon it at this session, but with a view that the select committee may turn their attention to the subject and report early in the next session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of how many shall the committee be composed?

Mr. SHERMAN. Seven, to be appointed by the Chair. The committees to whom the matter would naturally be referred have a great deal of business on hand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the bill be referred to a select committee to consist of seven members.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I also move that the bill be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Messrs. SHERMAN, SUMNER, CHANDLER, RAMSEY, STEWART, BUCKALEW, and VICKERS were appointed the committee.

ONEIDA INDIANS.

Mr. HOWE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to inform the Senate whether he has issued any order or adopted any regulation prohibiting the individuals of the Oneida tribe of Indians from cutting and removing timber from the common lands of the tribe; and if so, under what laws such prohibition is sanctioned, and what penalties are imposed for a violation of such rule. Also, if he has authorized the agent of said tribe to sell such timber and take pay therefor; and what security he has taken of such agent for the proper disposition of the proceeds of such sales.

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW INDIANS.

Mr. HARLAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to furnish the Senate, as soon as practicable, any information in his possession relative to the present status of the claims of loyal Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, under the forty-ninth article of the treaty with those tribes of April 28, 1866, and to inform the Senate what moneys or securities are held by the United States for said tribes.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1059.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1059) to relieve certain citizens of North Carolina of disabilities.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, there are before the Senate several reports from the Judiciary Committee on this subject; one to relieve citizens of North Carolina—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Would it not be well to have the bill read first?

Mr. STEWART. Allow me one word of explanation. There have been reported from the committee several propositions of this sort: a bill to remove disabilities from citizens of North Carolina, and also, a bill to remove disabilities from citizens of Alabama. The committee have considered a large number of other names in an informal way, and I desire to propose, in lieu of the bill that is before the Senate, an amendment, in the nature of a substitute, containing a variety of names. It will be unnecessary, therefore, to read the original bill. The substitute that I offer contains all the names embraced in the bill, and also combines all the bills that have been reported, and those that have been sent to the Judiciary Committee on this subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the original bill will be dispensed with unless it is called for by some Senator, and the substitute only will be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the amendment, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert the following in lieu thereof:

(Two thirds of each House concurring therein.) That all legal and political disabilities imposed by the United States upon the following-named citizens of North Carolina in consequence of participation in the recent rebellion be, and the same are hereby, removed, namely:

Before the reading of the amendment was concluded,

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to inquire whether there is any particular necessity for reading all those names. There is a long list of names there, and the Senate know nothing about the particular individuals, but must depend of course upon the Committee on the Judiciary. For the sake of saving time I suggest that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the names may be dispensed with by unanimous consent. Is there any objection? No objection being made, the reading of the names will be dispensed with.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should like to inquire of the Senator having charge of the bill if the name of Joseph Keener, of Jackson county, North Carolina, for whose relief I presented a petition, is included.

Mr. STEWART. I do not recollect.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I would also inquire in regard to James W. Terrell, of Jackson county, North Carolina, whose petition I presented the other day. I move that those names be inserted.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to know who those persons are, and whether due inquiry has been made in regard to them, what their position and opinions are. I do not mean now what are called mere political opinions, but how far they are prepared to forget their former offenses. I should like to hear something about them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. CONNESS. If we can get no information as to these names, I for one shall vote against the bill if they are inserted, because I will not vote to remove the disabilities from any man unless his case has been examined sufficiently to give us a guarantee for his obeying the law and keeping the peace in the future. I shall oppose the bill in all its stages unless we have that guarantee.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I presented the petition of Mr. Keener, and it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The facts set out in the petition are no doubt correct. I have received a letter from him, in which he makes a statement in relation to himself. He says in his letter to me:

"In addition to the facts stated in the petition, you may say truly that I have not at any time thrown any obstacle in the way of reconstruction under the law. As a member of the Legislature of North Carolina since the rebellion, in 1865, I gave my support to the most liberal legislation for the freedmen of this State. It is due to truth and candor to state that I was opposed to the present constitution of North Carolina. Should you feel any delicacy in asking pardon for a so-called rebel, you will be kind enough to hand this petition to some other person who has not."

The petition is in the hands of the Judiciary Committee, and I supposed the committee would act upon it. He does not state in his letter to me what part he took in the rebellion. If the Senator from Nevada will send for the petition he can ascertain the facts.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask the Senator if he knows anything personally about this case.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not, except from the letters I have received; and how are we to act on these cases? Here come before the Senate two or three hundred names.

Mr. POMEROY. Does the Senator know the parties who wrote the letters?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This is the letter I received from the gentleman himself.

Mr. POMEROY. Do you know him?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not personally know him, but I felt called upon to present the petition.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senator will send up the letter to be read at the desk. I have not heard a word of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not propose to withdraw it unless there is some good reason for withdrawing it. This gentleman I suppose is like the other gentlemen who are named in this bill, men who have at some time given their support directly or indirectly to the rebellion while the thing was progressing; but now that it is over, and that there is a proposition that disabilities be removed, these gentlemen ask that their disabilities may be removed.

Mr. Terrell says that he was opposed to the constitution framed for North Carolina by the convention of 1868, "but should it be finally adopted I expect to make a quiet and peaceable citizen under it. In the late election in this State my name was placed on the ticket for county commissioner without my knowledge, and I was elected. It is true this is a very small office, but I think it of some local importance that I be permitted to hold it. Besides, whether I ever seek office or not, I would of course prefer freedom from disabilities." This is signed by James W. Terrell, who has been elected county commissioner.

Mr. STEWART. I have sent for the petitions in these cases, and I find that they are signed by the petitioners alone, and I came across no one who could give me any information in regard to them. I could get no further information than was in the petitions of the parties themselves. The cases may be all right, but I should not like to act affirmatively on their own mere statement.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I would suggest to the Senator from Nevada that, so far as I have observed, the Committee on the Judiciary have desired to restore the men elected to office as far as possible. The last person named seems to have been elected to the office of county commissioner.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. With the leave of the Senate I will read what the petitioner states, and I think it will be satisfactory to the Senate:

WEBSTER, JACKSON COUNTY, NORTH CAROLINA,
May 25, 1868.

To the Honorable the Senate and
House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The petition of James W. Terrell respectfully sheweth that he was appointed postmaster at the small county office of Qualla Town, in the county of Haywood, in the fall of 1852, and held that position until the breaking out of hostilities in 1861; that by participation in the rebellion as a captain in the confederate army he falls within the restrictions of the proposed fourteenth article to the Constitution of the United States; and your petitioner further sheweth that at the late election in this State he was elected county commissioner for the county of Jackson. He therefore respectfully asks that your honorable body remove the disability in his case so as to allow him to take the position to which he has been elected; and, as in duty bound, your petitioner will ever pray.

JAMES W. TERRELL.

I have no doubt that is the state of the fact.

Mr. CONNESS. Now, if the Senator will permit me—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Allow me to read also the petition of the other party, and then the whole facts will be presented to the Senate:

WEBSTER, JACKSON COUNTY, NORTH CAROLINA,
May 25, 1868.

To the Honorable the Senate and
House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The petition of Joseph Keener respectfully sheweth that he was from the year 1839 to 1844 a member of the Legislature of North Carolina, and that during the war of the rebellion, although above the age of bearing arms, he sympathized with the confederate army, and was also during the war a member of the North Carolina Legislature, which brings him under the restrictions of the Howard amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Your petitioner further sheweth that he was, at the late election in North Carolina, elected to the lower House of the Legislature. He therefore prays your honorable body to remove his disability, so as to allow him to take his seat in that body to which he has been elected; and, as in duty bound, your petitioner will ever pray.

J. KEENER.

Those are the papers which I received and had referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONNESS. Now, Mr. President, I have simply to say in regard to these cases that I am prepared to vote at any time to remove the disability from any of those citizens who have been engaged in the rebellion when it shall appear, outside of their own testimony, and in addition to it, that they were not guilty of cruelties and violations of the laws of war and of civilization pending the war, and when it shall be shown in addition that they are now prepared in good faith to "accept the situation," not to accept it and fight it, but to accept it and become peaceable residents and citizens of the United States. We are dealing with persons who voluntarily disfranchised themselves, made themselves alien to our country and its institutions. I am prepared, notwithstanding, to deal liberally and generously with that portion of them who did not commit unnatural crimes, who did not violate the laws of war and humanity, and who are now prepared to act in good faith toward the nation and its people; but I desire other than their own testimony as to that point. Since I have been here, and since the termination of the war, I have had many such letters from persons known to me, some of whom left the State of which I am a resident and went to participate in the war, and did take part in it; but their letters were of such a character, while they were seeking pardon and exemption from disabilities, that I could not present them, nor ask for such relief for them. In no instance have I had a letter that did not give evidence of the pride of opinion and of section and of faction that led to the war.

Mr. President, the business upon which we are entering this morning, if we pass this bill as proposed by the member of the Judiciary Committee, carries with it a great many risks at best. We are sure to readmit to the rights and privileges of citizenship many who are not fit for them. We are bound, it appears to me, to exercise peculiar care. I am not prepared to relieve the disabilities of any person upon his own petition. Let those petitions be referred to the Judiciary Committee. Let them investigate through the best means in their power, and ascertain who the parties are, what their antecedents are. I will not now be understood, again I say, as referring to political opinions, because if a man has not the right to disagree to propositions submitted to him I do not know any other right that he can be said to have; but I wish that his patriotism, his disposition to behave well in future, shall be tried and established. Therefore I hope that we shall not agree to the amendment of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, but that those names will be referred to the committee and acted upon in the future, if found to be worthy of such action.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, and as my vote is governed by the general view which I entertain with regard to the duty of Congress in cases of this kind I desire to state it now very briefly, so as to avoid the necessity of stating it again. I think it is safer for society, I think it is safer for the peace of the country, North and South, that all political disabilities which have grown out of this rebellion should cease. I would prefer a general law to that effect. But while no such general law is upon the statute-book, if any citizen now laboring under those disabilities makes respectful application to Congress for their removal, I will vote to grant the prayer of his petition, because I believe it is better for those communities that persons laboring under these disabilities should be able by their votes, and as members of the Legislatures of those States, to make known their wants and feelings, than that they should be kept a discontented, sullen class in society, and their disabilities thus remain simply a source of evil. I think a true policy requires the same principle to be adopted with regard to them that I would apply to other adult citizens who may have what some would consider disqualifications for the exercise of the elective franchise, but to whom the extension of that franchise is safer than its denial. The general principle applies, in my judgment, to all alike.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. CONNESS. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will simply state the fact which is stated in their petitions; one of these persons is elected a county commissioner, and one is elected a member of the Legislature. They both set out this fact in their petition, and ask to have the disabilities removed. There are hundreds of names contained in the bill, as reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, but I presume the Committee on the Judiciary have had no opportunity to inquire into the particulars in relation to these persons, except the fact that they have been elected, perhaps, to office in the State of North Carolina, and it is desirable that this disability should be removed, so that they can accept the offices to which they are elected.

Mr. STEWART. I will inform the Senator that, in regard to all of them, I have seen somebody who knew them, or received letters from persons whom I knew, and who were known to Senators, with regard to the facts. The name of no man is inserted without being vouched for by somebody who knows him.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will state further, for the information of the Senator from Wisconsin, that the Senator from Nevada has had particularly in charge this matter of inquiring into the character and conduct of the men who have been recommended to have their disabilities removed; and that he has spent a great deal of time on the subject. During the last two months he has made inquiries of everybody from whom he could obtain information. I will state further, that most of the persons whose disabilities are recommended to be removed by the Committee on the Judiciary are persons whom the constitutional conventions have recommended should be released from their political disabilities. I believe we have included every name thus recommended by the constitutional conventions. I think every name they recommended has been inserted, and there are some names added to that list, on the representation of reliable persons in those States, with whom the Senator from Nevada has had intercourse, and from whom he has obtained information. I admit that it is very difficult to obtain satisfactory information in regard to perhaps a thousand names, but the committee have taken the recommendations of the constitutional conventions as far as they went, and have added a few names upon what they regarded reliable authority. This was the best disposition we found it in our power to make. It may not be entirely satisfactory; and I wish to say to the Senator from California that it is possible the committee have made mistakes, and it would be wonderful if they had not made some in this long list of names from several States; but we have had to act upon such information as we could obtain, adopting, as a principle, to relieve everybody who gave evidence of his intention to acquiesce fairly in the condition of the country brought about by the results of the war, and to sustain honestly and fairly the laws which have been enacted by Congress for the reorganization of the rebel States.

Mr. CONNESS. I have not complained of the investigations made by the committee. I have only suggested that we should not add names upon their individual application. We have the name now of one of the two persons here before us who says he is a member-elect of the Legislature of the State of North Carolina. There is no recommendation from any other source in favor of remitting the political disabilities in his case. Why, sir, his vote in the Legislature may send a man here that we cannot admit. While we are endeavoring to admit these States to equal representation in Congress, is it possible that such a man could not have found loyal citizens in North Carolina to recommend him to Congress? Certainly not. He has either not taken the trouble to do it, or fearing that he could not he has not undertaken it. I only complain that the committee seem prepared to admit amendments of this character. When a committee have made the best investigation and the most careful inquiry they can they have exhausted their power in the premises; and I am so willing to relieve this class of disabilities that I am ready to take any report that a standing committee of this body shall make, unless I know of special facts to the contrary.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am disposed to be very liberal in the exercise of this power; but there will be numerous applications of this kind to Congress, and what we do now may be regarded as a precedent hereafter. If now we relieve persons from these disabilities upon their own petitions, without any evidence whatever as to their former conduct or present character or opinions, we shall establish a precedent, as it seems to me, that renders this constitutional disability a perfect nullity—a mere piece of mockery. The President of the United States will not pardon any man upon his own individual application; that application must be supported by some other evidence, showing that the man has some merit of some kind or description. If this petition was accompanied by any affidavit of any person stating that these men were men whose characters afforded sufficient guarantee that they would be good and peaceable citizens I should be very much disposed to include them within this bill; but we do not know but that they may be leaders in the Ku-Klux-Klan; they may be men engaged in deeds of violence, or who countenance violence and crime in southern States, and are otherwise objectionable. If they are not included in this bill that does not necessarily preclude them from obtaining the benefits of a law like this. I have no doubt that we shall be constantly passing laws of this description. If these men will bring forward some affidavit or some evidence of some nature or description that they are suitable men to whom this favor of Congress should be extended, I am prepared to go for it. I am in favor of a liberal policy on this subject; but I do not think we ought at once to dispense with the constitutional disability and treat it as a perfect nullity and allow any man simply to come in here with a mere petition and have Congress remove his disability.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish to say one word in reply to a remark made by the Senator from California, that the committee seem disposed to admit these amendments. The committee has not expressed any opinion that this amendment be adopted. It is offered here in the Senate; the committee has not considered it at all. So far as I am concerned, I beg leave to say to the Senate that these petitions do not present a case that calls upon the Senate, in my judgment, to relieve these parties. What do they say? They state in their petitions that they have been elected to office; they do not even profess themselves that they are prepared to abide by the legislation of Congress. They make no pretense of the kind; they simply say that they were engaged in the rebellion, and have been elected to office, and ask to be relieved. Who elected them? For aught I know they may have been elected by the enemies of the country, by the worst rebels there are there. If there was any statement in the petition itself it would present a different case. We not only have no evidence from anybody that these parties are of that class who ought to be relieved from disabilities, but we have not a statement of the parties themselves; and unless Congress is prepared at once to pass a general law relieving everybody, there certainly is no case presented by these two parties.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 12, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cole, Davis, Doolittle, Ferry, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, McCreery, Patterson of Tennessee, Sprague, Van Winkle, and Vickers—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Drake, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Pomeroy, Sherman, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Wade, Walcott, Williams, and Wilson—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Cattell, Cragin, Dixon, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Morton, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Ross, Saulsbury, Stewart, and Yates—19.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDRICKS. At the close of the fourth section I move to add the words "and George W. Jones, of Tennessee."

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to hear some statement about Mr. Jones.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not think it necessary to make a statement about him, he is so well known to most of the Senators—particularly known to the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who served in the House of Representatives with him—as one of those southern men who always opposed secession. I believe at one time he was a member of the Richmond congress, and that is all the connection he had with the southern cause, so far as I know. It was known to the Senator from Ohio, I believe, as it was known to myself when I served in the House of Representatives with him, that he was opposed at all times to the policy of the extreme men of the South. He was as conservative in his views as anybody in the House, and devoted to the Union.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to inquire of the honorable Senator whether there is an application from Mr. Jones.

Mr. HENDRICKS. No, sir; I do it as his friend, so far as I know.

Mr. CONNESS. You propose to grant him relief for which he does not apply?

Mr. JOHNSON. He has applied.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the committee to whom his application has been referred will state to us why that application has not been granted, or what action has been taken upon it. I will go very far toward taking any statement the honorable Senator from Indiana may make, and my purpose is not to doubt any statement that he does make; but if Mr. Jones has made an application I should like to know before I vote what it is; I should like to hear it read, and to know why the committee have refused it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understand that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] has a letter from Mr. Jones on this subject. He did not refer it to the committee, and I did not know of any such letter, and I did not base my motion upon the letter. In that letter I understand he expresses his earnest desire to be relieved from political disabilities. I made my proposition upon my own knowledge of him. I know that, as a member of the House of Representatives, he was one of the most useful members, a vigilant, careful, attentive man, esteemed by men of all sections. He was not a sectional man, and was as much opposed, in my judgment, to the secession movement as any man in the North. He was extremely bitter against it. I saw him as late as the summer of 1860, and had conversations with him. Indeed, I think I had conversations with him in the spring of 1861. Just how late it was I will not say, but it was in the summer of 1860 or the spring of 1861. I knew even up to that time how very bitterly he was opposed to all such movements. During the whole course of his service, during the four years I was in the other House with him, there was no man more opposed to the extreme views of the South than he was. He was a useful man, a man of intellect, a man of high integrity, and will be useful whenever he comes to assist in the great work of the restoration of this country.

Mr. COLE. The Senator from Indiana is a member of the Judiciary Committee, and can inform us whether this name was before the committee and whether it has been acted on by the committee, whether it has been rejected by the committee or not.

Mr. HENDRICKS. My impression is, but I will not speak with confidence about that, that I suggested to the Senator from Nevada to add Mr. Jones's name; and I think the objection was that this bill was confined to two States, Alabama and North Carolina. That was the only objection that was made in the committee, so far as I understood.

Mr. STEWART. The name was not considered in committee.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Except just that far. Allow me to add that I would rather, from my own knowledge of a man, his fitness to be a citizen, represent the case without his application than with it. I know George W. Jones as well as I do almost any public man, and I am willing to vouch for his honor anywhere and everywhere.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, we ought not to make this matter of removing political disabilities a mere farce. I do not concur, therefore, in the declaration made by the Senator from Connecticut. Toward the people of the rebel States our first duty was and is to do justice. We have in a measure done justice to the loyal men of those States. Our next duty to the people of those States is to be merciful to the disloyal, to those who have offended against the laws of the country. There are probably about fifty thousand of these persons under disabilities. I am willing to remove the disabilities of the great body of these persons at once. There are a few hundreds of the men who engaged in the rebellion I would allow to wait a little while until they manifest a disposition to support their country and its institutions. Without one cause on earth these men plunged the nation into civil war. The blood of hundreds of thousands of their countrymen is on their souls. No previous character, no certificates can remove from them the crime of rebellion against their country. Upon the heads of these leading men rests the responsibility of the blood and the crimes of the last seven years. Before the nations, before God, these leaders of the rebellion are responsible for the sorrow and agony of the great civil war through which the nation has passed. In spite of their crimes against their country, which will blacken as the ages roll on, I shall be ready to pardon any one of them whenever he manifests a disposition to submit to the authority of the Government, and to use the influences that belong to him as a citizen of the United States to maintain the laws of the country. Whenever and wherever I see manifested a spirit of loyalty, a disposition to do justice to others, to accord to others what it asks for itself, I shall hasten to relieve political disabilities.

Sir, I understand that this bill applies to two or three States, and that the Judiciary Committee intend to report other measures of relief. As this is the first bill for the removal of political disabilities, I think we had better pass it as it came from the Judiciary Committee. We shall doubtless have at this session of Congress other bills in which these amendments may be incorporated by the committee after investigation. I have since the close of the rebellion been in favor of universal amnesty and universal suffrage. Had those under disabilities been willing to unite with us in according rights to others their own disabilities might have been removed ere this. But while these persons who were laboring under disabilities have demanded what they choose to call their rights, they have strenuously striven to withhold rights from others. Against their protest, against their active efforts, against the protests and efforts of their friends, Congress, after a two years' struggle, and the people of eight States lately in rebellion, have achieved civil and political rights for the millions lately held in bondage. Many of these men, laboring under political disabilities, are madly striving to undo what has been done, to overturn what has been established, and to take from their fellow-men rights they demand for themselves. Now, I am willing that these men, guilty of the war, who were criminally guilty during the war, and who are more bitterly disloyal now than they were before the war or during the war, should remain under political disabilities until the spirit of the rebellion shall manifest itself less fiercely in their acts than it now does, and until the hopes that led them into rebellion and now animate them in their struggles shall have disappeared forever. Men who ask for the mercy of their victorious country should at least deal justly with their countrymen whose rights are quite as sacred as their own.

The Senator from Indiana wishes to remove the disabilities of Mr. George W. Jones, of Tennessee, formerly a member of the House of Representatives. It is true Mr. Jones opposed the movements tending to rebellion, but he bowed to the rebellion when it was inaugurated, and was a member of the rebel congress. Whenever he shall ask for the removal of political disabilities I shall be ready to comply with his wishes. I have not learned that he has asked for the removal of disabilities, or that he has manifested a disposition to acquiesce without a further struggle in the policy of the Government, essential to secure the unity of the country and the liberties of the people. In voting to remove political disabilities I do not require that the person relieved shall be a believer in my political faith, or a supporter of my political principles. The Republican party had no traitors in its ranks. It never had any sympathy with treason or with traitors. It overthrew slavery, the inspiration of the rebellion, and has given to the emancipated bondmen the rights and privileges of American citizenship. To support the ever-loyal Republican party, to sustain its wise and beneficent measures of reconstruction upon the basis of loyalty and liberty, affords to Congress and the world ample evidence of the abandonment of the fatal theories and policies of the rebellion, and of genuine repentance for the errors of the past. I am ready, and I am sure Congress will be ready, to remove the disabilities of such a rebel, and the loyal heart of the country will readily welcome the removal of such disabilities. I do not, however, ask that the rebel who does work for repentance shall act with the Republican party before I consent to relieve him. I have recommended, and I shall continue to recommend, the relief of gentlemen I believe to be fair-minded men; men who are ready to acquiesce in the results of the war, and to stand by their country in the future, although such persons have no political sympathy with me, or with the great party with which I act.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Chair feels called upon to announce the fact that the unfinished business of yesterday is regularly before the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not wish by my amendment to delay this bill.

Mr. WILSON. I hope this bill will be passed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to allowing the unfinished business to go over temporarily for a few minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the order of the day will be passed over informally. It is so ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I served four years in the House of Representatives with George W. Jones. I came to know and esteem him as an honest man, as a clear-headed and able legislator. No man in the House of Representatives, in my judgment, was more useful to the country; no man more contributed to save the public Treasury from thieves and plunderers than George W. Jones. Naturally an honest man, his nature was against all wrong upon the public Treasury. I esteemed him as one of the most useful of legislators; and it was a pleasure to me this morning to have the opportunity, as his friend, as one who esteemed him as an honest man, and as a useful citizen, to make this motion. But sir, from the Senate, from the Congress, I will not accept of his restoration to political rights grudgingly. If it is not given cheerfully, because he has shown his devotion to his country, because for years he stood out firmly, fearlessly, in the midst of much opposition, against every movement in the southern States that tended to secession, let it not be given at all. It was because I knew this, because I knew that there ought not to be a moment of delay when you are restoring men for political considerations, to restore one man upon the consideration that he was an honest man and a faithful public servant that I offered this amendment. But sir, as it is contested, I shall not accept it as a thing granted grudgingly, and I withdraw the amendment. I was not written to by Mr. Jones, no appeal was made to me for him. I wanted to do it as his friend, as one that knew him to be a good man.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the Senator withdraws his amendment I desire to say a word.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly, I will let it stand for that purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN. I served with Mr. Jones six years in the House of Representatives. He was one of the oldest members in consecutive service. Mr. Houston and Mr. Jones were, I think, the oldest members of the House in consecutive service while I was there. Mr. Jones was undoubtedly what the Senator from Indiana says, a thoroughly honest, reliable man; one of the most useful legislators from any section of the country we had in the House of Representatives; and I have no doubt that the Judiciary Committee would have proposed to relieve him from all political disabilities if his case had been brought to them. He was a Union man up to the breaking out of the war, and was dragged by mistake into secession. What part he took in the war I do not know. I know, however, that he remonstrated against the vile conduct of the representatives from the seceding States, but I have no doubt he has come within the disabilities of the law, because I understand he was for a time at least a member of the rebel congress. Mr. Jones has been here since, and I have no doubt desires the reconstruction of the southern States. He lives in a State which has long been in harmony with the Union, the State of Tennessee. I agree, however, that in this bill we ought to include no case which has not been examined by the Judiciary Committee. I am very glad the Senator from Indiana proposes to withdraw his amendment, and the Judiciary Committee will no doubt consider this as sufficient notice, and will inscribe the name of George W. Jones, of Tennessee, in the next roll of persons to be relieved from disabilities.

Mr. CONNESS. I was just about to say that there was no indorsement which could be made of the character of a man that I would sooner receive than that made by the honorable Senator from Indiana; and after hearing him the second time, so far as I was concerned, I was about to withdraw all opposition that I had made to the amendment he proposed; and if he shall see fit to allow it to remain I shall so withdraw all opposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope, then, it will be allowed to go upon the bill.

Mr. CONNESS. I withdraw all opposition, but with the understanding that the safe mode is, as suggested by the Senator from Ohio, that these cases be regularly examined by the committee.

Mr. HENDRICKS. What the Senator from California says is most agreeable to me; it is very gratifying to me, indeed, and unless there be further objection I will leave my amendment to stand.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I hope the amendment will be adopted. I knew Mr. Jones in the House of Representatives, and as the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Ohio have said he was one of the most useful men there in relation to the subject of claims against the Government that I ever knew, with the exception, perhaps, of Mr. Giddings. He was a bitter partisan; but he was, through and through in spite of that, an honest man. He is now an old man, and I trust there will be no opposition to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. I move to amend the amendment by inserting at the end of the fourth section a name which has been accidentally omitted, the name of Thomas J. Mackey, of South Carolina, an excellent man, very well known to gentlemen here.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VICKERS. I offer this amendment as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That all legal and political disabilities imposed by the United States upon all citizens of the eleven southern States which were in rebellion in consequence of participation in the recent rebellion be, and the same are hereby removed: Provided, That each of said persons shall first take an oath before a judge of a court, or before the clerk or prothonotary of the county where he may reside, that he will support the Constitution of the United States. And that this section shall not apply to any one who may be under indictment for a violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The amendment of Mr. STEWART, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read the third time. The bill was read the third time.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to say a word before the bill is passed. I understand that opposition to it would be entirely fruitless; and I shall content myself with a vote against it without asking for a formal call of the yeas and nays.

I object to the system of legislation of which this bill is an illustration, in the first place, because this is a sort of exercise of pardoning power by Congress. I consider it a very bad and pernicious system in itself. In the next place, I object to it because it must necessarily be partial and unfair. I am told that there are about four hundred names in this bill. Out of that whole number I know only two upon one side of politics. There may be more, but the number is scarcely worth counting. Nearly the entire number of the four hundred are selected with reference to party objects. A convention to form a constitution meets in North Carolina, and the political majority in the convention pass around the State, pick out their prominent, active, useful political friends, and they recommend them in a body here to Congress. They desire these men to take the offices of the State, wield the political influence of the State, and to be useful to the party organization in the future; and these names, under that general recommendation, are reported as a matter of course from the Judiciary Committee, who know nothing about the individuals, and they are passed here upon the ground that the convention has recommended them.

Then we are told that some names have been added by the committee, on the recommendation of whom? Of these political gentlemen from the South who have been chosen to offices or expect to hold offices under the new constitutions, and who are in political accord with the majority of Congress. A few of those names are added. One name I believe was added in committee upon the other side, and one has been added by a vote of the Senate just taken. I consider those additions of a few names to be quite politic, as it gives a sort of odor of fairness, though in an infinitely small degree, to the proceeding. But substantially this kind of legislation must be purely partisan in its character. It can be nothing else. I am not complaining of gentlemen of the majority who make up bills in this way and pass bills of this character. If we are to enter upon the system at all it is in human nature, it is inevitable, that the system should be such as I have described it.

Now, sir, nothing can be clearer than that the power to remove disabilities incurred by crime is a function which pertains to the President of the United States under the Constitution. This legislation is in the nature—I will not assert that it is absolutely so—but it is in the nature of a usurpation of executive power. In the first place, under a general law, you impose penal consequences upon past conduct by an ex post facto law. Whether you administer that system through the courts, or administer it directly through political agencies, is immaterial. The nature of the thing is to punish men for their conduct, and punish them for crimes which they have committed; and then Congress reserves to itself a dispensing power, which is in its nature a pardoning power; and you are exercising that by this legislation.

On principle, therefore, this whole system is, in my judgment, open to the strongest, clearest, most powerful objections; and besides that, when you come to look at it practically you discover what it is and what it must be in its very nature, an unfair, partial, and partisan system. You can make nothing else of it. It does not make any difference who administers it, what class of men in Congress vote these bills through; such must be its character everlastingly and always. And herein, in this very fact, we have a proof of the wisdom of those constitutional arrangements in the Federal Government, and in the several States, and in other countries having civilized institutions, by which clemency, pardon, the dispensing with laws is everywhere lodged with the executive power of the Government. It cannot be exercised by a numerous body. If it is lodged with them it must become a thing odious and unjust; it must be partial and unfair; it must be partisan and partisan only; and if any persons are included or brought within the scope of a system of irregular benevolence of this kind who do not belong to the political party in power, it must be simply to give an odor of apparent fairness to a system which is essentially unjust.

I do not, as I said, choose to protract debate on this subject. I have simply said so much to indicate the vote which I shall give on this and on all other similar bills short of a general bill which shall remove disabilities. I would vote for a bill which removed disabilities as a general rule, leaving some particular exceptions, because, in substance, that would be repealing your former laws. I am willing to vote for anything which is in the nature of a repealing statute, or substantially a repealing statute, but for no bill which is in its nature a dispensing statute, a statute dispensing with the existing law.

Mr. HOWARD. If the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, before he takes his seat, will answer me one short query, I shall be obliged to him. If I understand him correctly, he holds, or seems to hold, that the rebels incurred no disabilities whatever which Congress can recognize. Did I misunderstand the gentleman?

Mr. BUCKALEW. I did not say so.

Mr. HOWARD. I understood him so to intimate; and I think that his argument when properly analyzed will come to exactly that result. Now, sir, I dissent entirely from such a view of the subject. I hold that by waging war upon the Government of the United States and committing treason, as they did by wholesale, the persons thus acting became enemies of the United States. They have been so considered by the whole community. They have been so treated by the authorities of the United States, civil and military. They have been so regarded by our courts of justice, and adjudged to be enemies of the United States.

Now, how has it come to pass that in a war, although it is characterized sometimes as a civil war, and properly, perhaps, the prevailing party has no authority to impose terms upon the opposite party when they are to be received again into fellowship and admitted to the enjoyment of political rights? I hold, sir, that by waging war upon the Government of the United States these people were public enemies. They so denominated themselves. They claimed to be the enemies of the United States. They boasted of it. It was with them a matter of exultation and pride.

Now, the war having closed, that is, the actual fighting having closed, while we are in process of settling the controversy and effectually suppressing the rebellion and reestablishing peace upon a secure and permanent basis, may we not declare that such and such persons, once enemies of the United States, shall be and remain permanently or temporarily, if we say so, under disabilities; and may we not properly whenever we see fit, as the law-making power, the prevailing party, relieve those persons from those disabilities? And may we not do this without incurring the charge which is perpetually hurled against a majority of this Senate of indulging in partisan legislation? Sir, there is no partisanship in it.

A few days ago the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] in commenting upon the bill for the extension of the Freedmen's Bureau, saw fit to characterize that great and beneficent measure as another partisan measure. It seems that we can do nothing, we can devise no measure that does not attract these odious epithets from our opponents on the other side of the Chamber. Whatever we do, be it this thing or the other, is sure to be stigmatized as a partisan measure by them.

Mr. CONNESS. Who are not party men!

Mr. HOWARD. They are not partisan men, of course; they are entirely above all party considerations! It is very true that every mother's son of them during the recent impeachment trial, not as a party measure, of course, [laughter,] voted for the acquittal of the accused. It was their consciences, undoubtedly, that led them to that conclusion. I find no fault with it. But let them remember that the country may look upon that unanimity, so singular among so many lawyers of this body, as a little suspicious, especially when they boast of their conscientious convictions and denounce us for indulging in partisan measures!

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The honorable Senator will allow me a single question. It is this—

Mr. SHERMAN. This debate is going on by unanimous consent, and I hope it will not be protracted.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I merely wish to ask a question.

Mr. HOWARD. If the honorable Senator wishes merely to put a question to me, I have no objection to yield.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My question is simply this: whether the honorable Senator does not think that his question to the Senator from Pennsylvania is a pretty long one? [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator from Pennsylvania had taken his seat.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. You asked him to give way for a question.

Mr. HOWARD. He had taken his seat, and I took the floor properly.

Mr. President, the gentlemen who fling this charge out so flippantly and constantly may as well take it for granted from this day forth that, as Republican Senators, we shall not be very swift to readmit into a participation in the affairs of this Government rebels who have always been their friends, whether they are the friends of rebels now or not. We shall not be very ready to admit back into Congress and into a participation in the affairs of the Government and the country those red-handed rebels who have given us heretofore so much trouble, and are still virulent and unrepentant. They may well take it for granted that we intend to have some security for the future against the recurrence of the bloody war which their southern friends and protégés have waged against us. For one, sir, I am bound, if I cannot have indemnity for the past, to have at least permanent security for the future; and I will knowingly relieve no one of them from his disabilities who still harbors in his heart the spirit of rebellion.

Sir, I think we had better make a little something out of the victories we have achieved, and not fling them away, as the honorable Senators on the other side of the Chamber wish us to do. I believe in no such doctrine. In making a bargain I will see to it that I get the best of it if I honestly can.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is very anxious to get up his bill, which is the regular order. I am, therefore, precluded from answering the Senator from Michigan. I will, however, make one remark. His speech about rebels and against rebellion, a speech which he always makes with such force, with such exactness of language and warmth of manner, is misapplied upon this bill. This is a bill to relieve rebels. That is its very object; and therefore declamation against rebels and the enormity of their offense is quite out of place, at least from the mouth of a gentleman who proposes to vote for this bill. All that is between the Senator from Michigan and myself, is the point of thus selecting one kind of rebels in preference to another kind. The Senator from Michigan would prefer to select for his clemency those red-handed and horrible rebels who are likely to vote for him, possibly to give him success in the elections of the present year. While he is selecting rebels, "red-handed rebels," for congressional clemency, I would choose that he should select a little from both sides, so that there should not be any disturbance in the effect on our national politics.

I am not asking him to emancipate anybody at present; I am proposing no bill; I am simply criticising this bill for the emancipation of rebels from the horrible condition of political inferiority in which they are plunged by congressional legislation, and I am suggesting, simply as a matter of criticism, a sort of political speculation of and concerning this legislation, that when you come to pick rebels by special delegation in congressional bills you will be very apt to pick those who will vote with you, who will assist you to hold office and to maintain predominance in authority in the Government of the United States; and hence the inconvenience of this system. I grant the Senator from Michigan that if my political friends were in power and were administering a system of this kind they would do precisely the same thing. They would follow the law of their own interests, and in emancipating red-handed rebels, bloody from the terrible scenes of the late war, they would select men who would give them political influence in the Government and maintain their authority.

The Senator does not perceive that my remarks, made only in vindication of the vote I propose to give, were directed to this general system, and were not intended to criticise or to complain particularly of his action, because I know that rests in human nature. We are so fallible, so imperfectly constituted, that we follow our own interests; and when we act as party men we follow our party interests. It is the system that is wrong, a system which cannot be administered fairly and justly and equally; which will always be perverted to the interests of the party to whose hands it is committed. I am endeavoring to call attention to this subject, so that at an early day—not at this moment—we shall return to sound principles. Of course this bill is going to pass, and the brain of the Senator from Nevada is doubtless teeming with other bills, which will doubtless be introduced by him into this Chamber, and which, possibly, we shall pass before we adjourn. I am calling attention to the subject, so that when the "sober second thought" comes after a little, when the pinch of the political emergency has passed, we shall return to sound principles with reference to this sort of legislation, and when we come to deal with "red-handed rebels" we shall attempt to deal with them equally and justly upon principles of public policy, instead of party expediency.

Mr. HOWARD and Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President—

Mr. STEWART. I hope we shall have a vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. HOWARD. Just one word. I wish to make a single remark.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the regular order of business, and I hope the Senate will proceed with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. STEWART. I call for a division on that motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the unfinished business comes up as a matter of course when called for. It is not necessary to take a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is true. It was informally passed over.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I believe I had the floor when the honorable Senator from Ohio called for the regular order of business; but if the regular order is up—

Mr. SHERMAN. It is up.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Then I have nothing to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before proceeding with the regular order, the Chair desires to lay before the Senate certain bills.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to make one remark. I am very much averse to cutting off the Senator from Michigan from any response, and I hope the Senate will let him have the floor.

Several SENATORS. Let us pass this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Debate is not in order on that. I am perfectly willing to take a vote on the passage of the bill, but—

Mr. HOWARD. But you are not willing to hear a word from the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SHERMAN. When the friends of the bill are not willing to allow a vote to be taken upon it, when debate will evidently delay action upon it, I certainly have a right to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order of the day is before the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. I move that it be temporarily laid aside; and let us try to get a vote on this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. You have tried it once.

Mr. STEWART. I know we have tried it once, but I think we can succeed this time.

Mr. SHERMAN. You can get a vote in the morning without any trouble.

Mr. STEWART. I do not think there will be any further debate. I make the motion for this reason—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order can be passed over by common consent.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is utterly idle to do it. I object.

Mr. STEWART. Give us five minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Five minutes would not be enough, nor twenty.

Mr. TRUMBULL, (to Mr. SHERMAN.) Give us until two o'clock, and if we do not pass it by that time we will take up your bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am perfectly willing to agree to that if that is the understanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the regular order be postponed until two o'clock, with a view of taking a vote on this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I have but a word to say.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understood I had the floor when the Senator from Ohio called for the order of the day.

Mr. SHERMAN. You can divide the time between you.

Mr. HOWARD. The difference between the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania and myself appears to be this, when expressed briefly and clearly: he would pass a bill removing all disabilities from rebels, making it of universal application, thus readmitting to their political rights every person who is already under political disabilities, while I would simply follow out the policy of this bill and readmit to political rights only such rebels as have brought forth fruits meet for repentance. That is the simple difference between the Senator from Pennsylvania and myself.

Now, sir, I take it for granted that the committee who have had this bill under consideration have investigated the merits of every person whose name is inserted in the bill, so far as it has been practicable for them to do so, and that they have learned that they have become repentant; that they are willing again to cooperate in the Government of the United States, and to abandon the rebelism which has made them insane heretofore. Whenever such a case shall present itself to me hereafter; whenever I find a person who has once been a rebel, who has heartily, cordially, and honestly abandoned his rebel sentiments, and is willing to return to his ancient allegiance, I will vote to relieve him of his disabilities; but I will not vote for a bill such as the Senator from Pennsylvania seems to suggest, relieving at one grand sweep from disability every rebel within the limits of the United States. There is where we differ, and there, I believe, is the point of difference between the party to which he belongs and the party to which I belong.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, this bill assumes that the fourteenth amendment proposed to the Constitution has already been adopted, and that these persons are in fact under disability; that, although as citizens of the United States they have been convicted of no crime whatever, they are under political disabilities and made incapable of holding office. I dissent from that assumption altogether.

Mr. CONKLING. How does it do it any more than the reconstruction act?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In relation to the reconstruction acts imposing disabilities I never believed that an act of Congress could impose a disability.

Mr. CONKLING. No; but how does this assume anything more than that?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Perhaps it assumes nothing more than that; but, sir, an act of Congress can no more put a man under disabilities until he be tried and convicted of some offense against the Government than an act of Congress could direct a guillotine to be erected and drag a man to it and take his head off. The whole attempt to do it is utterly unconstitutional and void. But if the constitutional amendment known as the fourteenth article is adopted, then it becomes a part of the constitutional law of the land, and could impose disabilities. I supposed that this bill must assume, as a matter of course, that that article had been adopted, or it could not assume to relieve disabilities. In my judgment there is no such power. As a matter of course other gentlemen who believe that they have the power to impose disabilities by law will take the opposite ground.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator will allow me, the bill was purposely framed so as to avoid deciding the question. If you will look at the wording of it, you will see that it declares "all legal and political disabilities imposed" are relieved. If there are any, then the intention is to remove them; if there are none, the bill will do no harm.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not care to dwell on this point. The principal difficulty is this: it is impossible for the Judiciary Committee to try the fifty or one hundred or two hundred thousand cases of persons at the South resting under disability. The doctrine contended for here is that the case of every individual must go to the committee and be examined, and the committee must have good reasons for reporting in any particular case, where a man is tried, in favor of relieving him from his disabilities. It is practically impossible to do justice to these persons in that way. It is impossible in the very nature of things. Therefore I insist that Congress should provide some general law by which these persons who are to be freed from the disabilities existing upon them can be tried by some tribunal, as it is impossible for the question to be tried here in Congress.

As to the number of persons resting under disabilities, some persons estimate that fifty thousand will cover the number. Why, sir, there are twenty-five thousand in Alabama alone, as the facts go to show. Under the first law that Congress ever passed on this subject every man who ever held any State office, executive, judicial, or legislative, who was required to take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, was put under disabilities. The estimate which gentlemen make of there being only fifty thousand of these men is utterly without foundation.

Now, in relation to this bill, and simply to show how unjust these proceedings must necessarily be, I have before me papers from North Carolina which show how these recommendations came here to the committee that the disabilities should be removed from these two hundred persons. It is a party recommendation of their party friends.

Mr. NYE. Let me inquire of the honorable Senator if that explanation is from Austin, from the same person from whom he presented a memorial the other day?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No, sir; it is not from Austin. Some two hundred or more names were sent forward here by party friends in North Carolina, certifying that they ought to have their disabilities removed. The Judiciary Committee could practically know nothing about them. They took this certificate; the names of those persons were put in the bill; and it is to be passed through. Of necessity, you do no justice in the case. It is simply a recommendation to us based upon the recommendation of party friends in North Carolina; and it must be so. I do not blame the committee, because they cannot examine the cases and try two hundred men before the committee. They cannot try fifty thousand men and determine this question. We have got to determine it by some general law. There is no other way in which justice can be attained.

I have no purpose to speak with a view to delay the action of the Senate. I have never, I believe, spoken before the Senate for the purpose of occupying time. I simply desire to present these points which force themselves upon my mind. I desire that the Judiciary Committee should bring forward some general proposition requiring a man to give bonds, or that he take oaths of allegiance, or something, so that it can be applied generally, and not applied simply to partisans on one side; that if a man believes in certain political doctrines we will remove his disabilities.

I have papers before me referring to several of the persons named in this bill, showing that they were among the most active among the secessionists of North Carolina, stating particularly what part they took in the rebellion; but I do not desire to mention them by name, nor to go into the details or the particulars. It would take up time to do it; but among the list contained in the bill are men who were the most active of all the secessionists of North Carolina—men who were members of the convention, who signed the ordinance of secession, persons who administered the laws in relation to conscription, persons who administered the laws in relation to the shooting of deserters by hundreds, men who were the bloodiest kind of rebels, if we are to judge from the part they took in the rebellion. But, sir, I do not care to go into the details or the particulars. I simply desire to protest that this is not the true mode in which to reach this evil. The Judiciary Committee should provide some general legislation, so that if a man brings himself within certain rules to be established he shall be entitled to amnesty.

Mr. FOWLER. I suppose that the clause in the constitutional amendment which this bill is intended to provide against was inserted for the reason that these persons in the southern States were not deemed safe persons to exercise the right of suffrage and hold office. If that was true at the time that clause was inserted in the constitutional amendment, it is true to-day, in my judgment. I do not think a sufficient length of time has elapsed to enable us to determine whether these persons are yet competent to exercise the right of franchise. If it had, I see no good reason why the bill might not be made general and applied to all. A great many of the persons included in this bill are not much better than the others. In my opinion, it would be better to postpone this subject until the whole country is satisfied that these persons ought to be admitted to their privileges as citizens of the United States, and then a general bill could be passed by the Congress of the United States for the relief of these men. I shall, therefore, vote against this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. STEWART. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be taken by yeas and nays, it being necessary that two thirds should vote for the bill to pass it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 35, nays 6, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Ferry, Fessenden, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Fowler, McGreevy, Vickers, and Wade—6.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Conkling, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Hendricks, Norton, Ramsey, Saulsbury, and Tipton—13.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this question the yeas are 35 and the nays 6. Two thirds having voted in the affirmative, the bill is passed.

On motion of Mr. STEWART, the title of the bill was amended so as to read: A bill to relieve disability of certain persons engaged in the late rebellion.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1218) appropriating money to sustain the Indian commission and carry out treaties made thereby, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 870) to remove political disabilities from Roderick R. Butler, of Tennessee.

The message further announced that the House requested the return of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 291) giving additional compensation to certain employes in the civil service of the Government at Washington, yesterday transmitted to the Senate for concurrence.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 534) relating to contested elections in the city of Washington, District of Columbia; and

A bill (H. R. No. 870) to remove political disabilities from Roderick R. Butler, of Tennessee.

RETURN OF A JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the joint resolution (H. R. No. 291) giving additional compensation to certain employes in the civil service of the Government at Washington be returned to the House of Representatives in accordance with the request they have just sent to us.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in obedience to law, a statement of contracts made by the quartermaster's department during the month of May, 1868; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

RECEPTION OF THE CHINESE EMBASSY.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Chair did me the honor, yesterday, to appoint me one of the committee to provide for the reception of the Chinese Embassy in the Senate Chamber. I am called away by other duties, and shall not be able to discharge this particular function. I therefore ask to be excused, and that my place may be supplied by the Chair.

The question being put, Mr. JOHNSON was excused.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will appoint Mr. HENDRICKS in place of Mr. JOHNSON on that committee.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1218) appropriating money to sustain the Indian commission and carry out treaties made thereby was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. As that is a matter of pressing necessity, I think it should go to the Committee on Appropriations. It came from the Committee on Appropriations in the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. POMEROY submitted an amendment, to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 818) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL BANKS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order is now before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 440) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. DAVIS to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance as the fifth section of the bill. The amendment of the committee is in these words:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That section twenty-two of the act aforesaid be so amended that the maximum limit of national circulation, fixed by said act, is hereby increased the sum of $20,000,000, which amount shall be issued only to banking associations organized in States and Territories having a less circulation than five dollars per each inhabitant, and so as to equalize the circulation in such States and Territories in proportion to population.

The amendment of Mr. DAVIS is to strike out all of the section after the enacting clause and to insert:

That there shall be withdrawn by the Comptroller of the Currency from the banks of any State or Territory that may have an excess of circulation notes upon the principles of their distribution as regulated by law and the rules established by the Treasury Department, and the circulation notes so withdrawn shall be distributed by the Comptroller of the Currency among the national banks of such States and Territories as may have less than their proper proportion of circulation notes.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. Mr. President, I wish to submit a few remarks in reference to the section now under consideration—the fifth section of the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio. I am disposed to vote for the section as it stands in the bill, if it can be so passed, although I think it proper for me to declare my dissent from some of the principles which it contains. I accept it as a good deal less than half a loaf when we cannot get the whole. I think something further should be done in reference to the want that this section proposes to remedy. I object particularly to the last clause of the section, although I do not know that its remaining in the section can do any harm. The words are, "And so to equalize the circulation of such States and Territories in proportion to population." Population is so manifestly an improper means of estimating the fair share of circulation which should go to each State and Territory, that I presume I need not discuss it at any length. If the distribution of circulation now was confined to population, especially at the rate here fixed, at five dollars per head, I should like to ask my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] what would become of his State? and I might ask the same question of the Senators from Massachusetts where the population is small compared with the extent of their business.

I am desirous also to make these remarks, because a sub-committee consisting of two members of the Finance Committee, the Senator from New York, [Mr. MORGAN], and our late associate, Mr. Guthrie, and myself, prepared and submitted to the Senate a bill on this subject of the equalization of the circulation throughout the Union, which was referred to the Finance Committee. As that measure received no action at the previous session I again prepared the bill, with some slight modifications, and submitted it to the Senate and had it referred to the Finance Committee at this session. I am thus, I may say, pledged, as it were, to the increase of the circulation, and upon principles which appear to me much more just and equitable than the section that is now before us. However, as I have said, I will accept that section as a part of this bill, supposing I can get nothing better, because I know that the want of additional bank capital is great, and that plain justice, to say nothing of the business of the country, demands that some such provision should be extended.

In the bill of which I have spoken the sub-committee endeavored to ascertain some fair ratio upon which this equalization could be based. The previous legislation on the subject had established the rule that one half of the circulation was to be distributed according to population, and the other half according to the business, banking capital, &c., of the State, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, or of the Comptroller of the Currency. By some means, when the new banking law was passed this section was left out, and afterward, after an interval of a year or more, the section was again inserted; so that that now stands as the rule for equalizing the circulation, and the only rule.

I ask the pardon of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] for forgetting that his proposition is under consideration at the present time; but my remarks have as much reference to his amendment as they have to the measure before us.

It was under these circumstances that the New England States obtained an excess of the circulation; and I am happy to say that, in my opinion, it was by no means their fault. It was not in consequence of any grasping disposition on their part, or any desire to obtain for themselves what they were not willing to allow to others. On the contrary, when this banking law was first passed, when the system was first put in operation, the banks and the people of New England and of every other portion of the country were strongly solicited to embark in it in order that the system might be started.

Again, when it was found that it was impossible that the national circulation and the circulation of the then remaining State banks could exist together, or could circulate together without disadvantage, at least to the national circulation, they were strongly urged to convert their remaining State banks into national banks, which they generally did; and, in fact, an amendment was passed to the law at that time by which the preference was given to the remaining State banks. They availed themselves of this, and the result is that they have now an excess of the circulation.

There is another consideration connected with it. On the plan that I proposed the excess would not be so great as it now seems; and from some calculations that were made at the time by myself and the gentlemen associated with me in the sub-committee I am persuaded, although our data were considerably vague, that the State of New York, for instance, has not to-day any excess of circulation.

I will, with the permission of the Senate, state some of the features of that plan. By it population was an element in ascertaining the ratio of circulation, but it was not the only element. It was compounded with the productions, mineral, manufacturing, and agricultural, of each State; that is to say, the amount to be given to each State was ascertained by a compounded ratio of its population and production. Although I should not, if that bill was before the Senate, insist upon precisely that mode of ascertaining it, I am satisfied it is the best that could possibly be adopted. Under the law as it stands, it is not even a combined ratio of population and production or capital or business, or whatever they call it. It is simply dividing one half according to the population—a very unfair and untrue basis—and dividing the other half according to the opinion of some officer of the business, &c., of the States. That plan proposed to reduce to certainty what can be reduced to certainty and ought to be reduced to certainty. It proposed to resort to the census, the decennial enumeration of the business and persons of the United States; and taking that as the basis to ascertain what is the population and what is the production of every State, and by compounding those ascertain the ratio. As I said before, I am satisfied that that is the fairest and most equitable way by which this could be done; but I was not wedded precisely to that plan if a better one, or one apparently better, could have been suggested.

As a further provision, when this ratio had been ascertained, $300,000,000 were to be apportioned among the several States. Three hundred million dollars was the limit of the circulation of these banks. Every State was to be assigned its portion under that $300,000,000, and States that had not their fair share now were to have it after. That would still leave some States in excess to a greater or less degree. The increase is not so great as it would at first appear, as I provided that the circulation of the banks in States having an excess should be reduced ten per cent. of their capital; that is, those now circulating ninety per cent. of their capital should circulate eighty per cent.; but this reduction was not to take place except as the bills were returned to the Treasury to be destroyed, and in case of a bank failing, or anything of that kind, of course it would lose the benefit of that circulation afterward.

My calculation was—and I must again apologize for a calculation that is made upon such vague data, but I made it the best way I could and after considerable reflection—that that would add not to exceed $40,000,000 to the circulation of the whole country; and it is done in this way: the excess that is now talked of, for instance, in the State of Massachusetts, is not as great as it is represented; that is, it is represented as much greater than it would be on a fair and equitable distribution of the circulation. I had provided, also, that the first benefits of this increased circulation should be given to State banks for six months from the passage of the act, taking that feature from the amendatory law which was introduced here, and to which I have already referred. I then had a further provision similar to that offered to this section by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] yesterday, namely, that if the circulation at any time exceeded $300,000,000, a number of greenbacks equal in amount to the excess should be withdrawn from circulation and permanently destroyed.

I think this plan provided, perhaps, for any case that was likely to occur, and ought not, I think, to be obnoxious to the objections that have been made on this floor on both sides. In the first place, it had the grand merit, or purported to have, and was designed to have, the grand merit of being equal and just to all the States and Territories. In the second place, the increase, if any, would have been very slow and gradual, because banks cannot be established in a day, and if there was any excess of the amount designed as circulation for the national banks it would be got rid of by redeeming as many greenbacks. I think that the one circulation, for all practical purposes, especially with the resumption of specie payments, would be as good as the other. I do not see that any injury would have been effected in any way, while the general interests would, perhaps, have been benefited.

I should like to call the attention of my western and northwestern friends, and perhaps others, to this consideration. We are plunged every year into a time of shortness of money and high exchanges. High prices must be paid for money whenever the crops come to be moved. We have not banking capital enough. This plan would give to Ohio, and to every western State beyond it, perhaps, an increase of banking circulation. If it was not sufficient to enable them to move the crops by means of their circulation, it would still lighten the difficulty a great deal, and it would cost them far less.

It may be said that this capital would have to be supplied from the East. Grant it; it would only be making a permanent loan to the West, a sufficiency, perhaps, for the removal of the crops, and it would not be thrown periodically almost into convulsions by the high prices of money.

As I have already stated, I am disposed to vote for this amendment of the committee, as we can get no better; but I thought it due to myself, and those who were associated with me, to say that we had prepared a different plan, which would have been submitted to the Senate if it had met the approbation in full or the committee. I have stated my own views and reasons, and I doubt not those of the gentlemen who were associated with me. But as I cannot get that plan, or cannot get a proper distribution of this circulation, as I am sure those whom this amendment will relieve are entitled to this additional circulation, I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I frankly confess that I am not well informed on the subject of finance, bank circulation especially. I admit the defect of my information generally in relation to those subjects. The amendment that I have offered is simply to attract the attention of Senators to the matter that they may consult together and make propositions, and in the future adopt the wisest and most just that can be made. That is all the purpose I have in relation to this matter.

Mr. President, we have a most extraordinary system of banking in the United States. The States may incorporate banks, but those banks can issue no paper for circulation. The entire circulation of the banks of the United States is furnished by the Government of the United States, and according to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency the aggregate amount is about three hundred and three or three hundred and four million dollars. I think the honorable Senator from West Virginia was about right, that the aggregate amount of circulation, according to the Comptroller of the Currency, is about three hundred and three or three hundred and four million dollars.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. A little less. Three hundred million dollars is the limit.

Mr. DAVIS. This report says about three hundred and three million dollars.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. There must be a deduction there for bills returned.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, a little less than $300,000,000; that is the limit. Now, sir, how is this circulation distributed among the States? Maine has $7,619,386; New Hampshire, $4,228,355; Vermont, $5,722,780; Massachusetts, $57,429,205; Rhode Island, $12,508,670; and Connecticut, $17,550,655; making an aggregate to the six New England States of $104,954,081; a sum considerably in excess above one third of the whole amount of the entire circulating notes of the United States. New York has $72,558,805; New Jersey, $9,150,165; Pennsylvania, $89,330,070. The aggregate of the circulation notes distributed to these three States, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, amounts to $121,039,000. So that the New England States have an excess of several millions over one third of the whole circulation; and the States of New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania having an excess of $21,000,000 above one third of the whole amount of the circulation.

Ohio has $18,454,280 of circulation, and Indiana has $11,042,240 of circulation. I suppose that these two States have something about their just proportion of the circulation notes of the United States; but there is a great excess over this just proportions given to the New England States, and also to the States of New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania. The six New England States, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana, have a circulation in the aggregate of $255,470,000, leaving to all the residue of the States only about forty-six million dollars of circulation notes, an amount less than Massachusetts has by $11,000,000, and less than New York has by about twenty-six million dollars, and only in excess of the circulation of Pennsylvania about seven million dollars. Is this a fair and proper distribution of the circulation notes that enter so largely into the circulating medium of the country? Should this vastly unequal and unjust distribution be allowed to remain undisturbed? Certainly not.

With the position of honorable Senators on the floor, who have expressed their desire that the Government of the United States and the banks of the United States should gradually come to the return of specie payments, I heartily agree.

But, Mr. President, something must be done in the intermediate time. There is a very great want of sufficient circulation in some sections and in some States of the United States. It seems to me that in New England there is a large excess of this circulation, and that in New York and Pennsylvania there is an excess. I do not hold that a redundant circulation is advantageous to a country. I believe in a full circulation, such an amount of circulation as will stimulate industry and quicken business and commercial exchanges. That condition of things is wholesome; but when the circulation exceeds that just point it seems to me that the excess of circulation becomes a vice and a disadvantage rather than an advantage.

Now, Mr. President, what is the proposition to remedy this unequal distribution of the circulation notes furnished by the United States? It is that an additional amount to the extent of $20,000 shall be issued for the purpose of being distributed in those States that have less than their due proportion.

There are two modes in which this may be done. One is suggested by my amendment, that the Comptroller of the Currency upon the principle, either simple or compound, on which he has distributed these circulation notes among the banks of the different States, shall withdraw as much from those that have an excess of circulation as that excess amounts to, and that he shall distribute it, upon the same principle as he has heretofore made distribution, among the banks of the States that have a deficiency of circulation. Can there be any just and reasonable objection to that? There certainly cannot be by gentlemen who are anxious to return to specie payments, because if the very way I suggest is not adopted there must be necessarily an inflation of the currency by the issue of $20,000,000 more of circulation notes. That I do not believe to be wise. It is certainly an unnatural and a vicious state of things for a country with the population and business of the United States to have a spurious paper circulation to the utter exclusion of all circulation of the precious metals. This evil ought not to be increased; it is not wisdom or sound political economy, in my judgment, to increase it; but it ought to be gradually reduced without producing any convulsion or great sacrifice of the interests of the country so as to reach gradually but certainly the point of the resumption of specie payments.

Mr. President, if there were $20,000,000 of circulation notes in the Treasury of the United States which the Government did not want to use otherwise, it would be a simple process for the Comptroller of the Currency to distribute those $20,000,000 of notes on deposit in the Treasury among the States that had less circulation than their share. How is the Government to get this amount of $20,000,000? I have suggested one mode.

There is another mode: let the Government reduce its expenditures. If it be practicable, and the Government will adopt at once the proposition to reduce its expenditures twenty or thirty millions a year, it would immediately be placed in possession of the amount of circulation notes to $20,000,000, or exceeding that sum, for distribution among the States that have less than their proper proportion.

How can that be done? By the simplest process in the world. Wherever there is a will there is a way. Here is a way, and the will is all that is necessary. The Army of the United States, according to the last official report that I saw, amounted to exceeding fifty-eight thousand men. There is certainly no necessity, in the present condition of the United States and its relations with themselves, with foreign countries, and with the Indian tribes, for one solitary soldier over twenty thousand. Then reduce your Army to twenty thousand men; reduce it by thirty thousand, and that would cause a saving to the public Treasury of at least a thousand dollars per man. The reduction of the Army by thirty thousand would render the sum in the Treasury for the support of the Army to the amount of $30,000,000 unnecessary to be appropriated to that object.

Here are two modes of getting this money; both of them, in my judgment, would be just and statesmanlike and proper. I think that the New England States have an excess of circulation; I think New York and Pennsylvania have an excess, also.

Now, what is the tendency of the circulation of the country and its aggregation? It is the commercial and manufacturing emporiums. The whole United States by its merchants and traders go to New York to lay in their stocks; they take those stocks home and distribute them over the whole country to their customers. Those customers exist in all the States, and most of them are producers, either agricultural, manufacturing, or mechanical. They want to sell the products of their own labor and skill at home. To purchase them a circulation among those producers in the distant and different States from the commercial emporium at New York is necessary. They cannot buy the goods that are purchased in that great emporium and distributed by the factors and merchants over the whole country unless they have the money to pay for them. They cannot get this money until they sell the products of their industry; they cannot sell those products of industry unless there be a circulation in the neighborhood, in the local markets where the sales take place, to pay for them.

Then an additional and a large additional circulation is necessary in most of the States in order to carry into complete effect this system of production and sale which I have just recounted. These local producers, agricultural, mechanical, and manufacturing, are the customers of the local merchants. The local merchants must have pay for their goods which they purchase in New York. To enable them to receive this pay their customers must have a circulation in their immediate neighborhoods with which to pay for these goods. They pay their accounts every six months or every twelve months, or give cash in hand to the merchants.

They pay in these circulation notes largely. The notes are thus aggregated in the hands of the local merchants; they take them on to New York with the purpose of laying in additional supplies. In that way the course of trade produces a constant and ever-recurring aggregation of the circulation of the whole country at the commercial emporium of New York and in the manufacturing emporiums of New England and of the Northwest, as at Cincinnati and Chicago and other points where there are extensive manufactures.

Mr. President, in my judgment, instead of the great manufacturing emporiums needing the largest distribution of circulation from the Comptroller of the Currency, they need proportionably the least amount, because the tendencies of trade, the results of their business and of their commerce, are to draw this circulation from every part and portion of the United States to those centers.

Now, sir, the United States Government has stifled the State banks. I was present when that mischievous policy was adopted, and, in my judgment, a more mischievous policy never was adopted. The banks in my State had on hand at that time gold and silver coin, some of them exceeding their circulation, and on an average about equal to it. How were those banks attacked by the policy of Congress? Congress could not repeal their charters, could not abrogate the banks by direct action; but they imposed a tax upon their circulation which the banks could not bear, and in that way forced them to withdraw their entire circulation and to go into the national banking system, and to receive the paper issued for the purposes of circulation and money from the Treasury of the United States. After this system has been adopted by Congress and the Government of the United States, is it right to leave to the State of Kentucky, for instance, that had a circulation of about fourteen million notes of its own banks, every dollar of which was convertible, at the pleasure of the holder, at the bank counter into gold or silver—is it just to that State, and other States similarly situated, to abolish their banks by the indirect legislation which I have adverted to, and to dole out to them the meagre circulation of a little above two million dollars where they had before the war upward of fourteen million? Sir, the system is wrong; it is unequal, it is unjust. If that course of measures which will finally lead to the resumption of specie payments is to be steadily persevered in, as it ought to be, in my judgment, you must compel the banks of the States that have such a vast overplus of their proportionate circulation, to yield up a portion of it, that this excess may be distributed among the States that have a deficiency.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Kentucky for a moment to the practical working of his amendment. I think the Senate would be more in favor of his idea if his amendment were made so that it could be practically carried out. How is the Comptroller to withdraw this circulation? Is it to be all from Massachusetts, or all from Massachusetts and Rhode Island, the two States having the greatest excess; or is a certain percentage of the whole to be taken; or is it to be drawn from the banks having a large circulation, excluding the smaller banks? The Senator will see that the amendment as it is could hardly be practically carried out by the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. DAVIS. I am fully aware that the honorable Senator from Vermont is much more competent to mature my idea and to reach my purpose than I am myself, because he is unquestionably much more familiar with this and all cognate subjects than I am or pretend to be. I shall therefore be obliged to him or to any other Senator who will endeavor to perfect, or bring into the best practical operation, the idea which I have suggested in my amendment. I am not wedded to that form; indeed, I am not satisfied with the form in which I have presented it. There are gentlemen here whose intelligence and knowledge of the subject-matter would enable them to present it in a much better form than I have done, and I desire and earnestly request them to do so. In the mean time I will throw out a few general ideas that ought, in my judgment, to be calculated to gain favor with the Senate for the general principle which I have proposed in my amendment.

The States of New England are highly manufacturing; the State of New Jersey is so; some of the principal cities of the northwestern States are so; and they send out and distribute over the whole country a large aggregate amount of the various manufactures of our people. They find their customers and their markets, to a very considerable extent, in the distant States; largely in my State. So of the merchants who import goods from foreign countries and sell them to the factors and country merchants all over the land. It is the interest of these merchants at New York and Baltimore and other commercial emporiums, and also of the manufacturers at all the principal points where manufacturing industry prevails, to make articles for exportation into other States, and it is important to them that the people of the States to which they send their manufactured articles and where they are sold should have the means of paying for them. It would add to their means, facilitate them in the acquisition of those means if there were a more equal and proportionate distribution of circulation notes among those States that are the purchasers and consumers of the articles sold at the commercial and manufacturing emporiums of the United States. I think a proper regard for their own interests would induce the people of the States that have a redundant currency to yield a portion of it, and the result of it would be a return of the money for which their goods and manufactured articles would be sold into the States, where a redistribution of the circulation would be made, and I believe that this equilibrium, by the course of the business and trade of the country, would soon be reestablished.

I think it is not only just, but it is the interest of the importing merchant, of the large manufacturer, of the men who sell their goods, wares, and merchandise, and their manufactured articles to those States that have a deficiency of circulation, that they should be reasonably and justly supplied with it. I think that if they would consent to yield back to the Comptroller of the Currency a portion of their circulation, it would not only be to the interest of the people of the States where it would go and in whose banks it would be placed, but it would be essentially and as much to the interests of the merchants and manufacturers of the States who gave it up.

But, Mr. President, there is a great principle involved in this question. If I, as an individual, am in debt, and I want money to pay my debts and am about to build a fine house that will cost a sum incompatible with the payment of my debts, what is my duty as an honest and a prudent man? It is to refrain from building my fine house and to appropriate the money which it would cost to the payment of my just debts. This relieves me from debt, makes me a freeman, for no man who owes money which he cannot pay is a freeman, and it does justice to those to whom I am indebted. The Government of the United States is somewhat in that condition. They have an Army of fifty-eight thousand men; those men cost something like fifteen hundred dollars a head per annum. To reduce the Army thirty thousand men, it is a small estimate to say, would save to the Treasury at least $30,000,000 a year. Let the majority, let the statesmen, let the patriots of Congress resort to that measure of retrenchment; let them reduce the Army to twenty thousand men, and there is no necessity whatever, public, general, or local, that requires an army of one man beyond that number, and immediately the Treasury of the United States and the United States are placed, within a reasonable time, in the possession of more than ten millions of circulating notes above the amount that is required to execute the provision that is now under consideration for distributing $20,000,000 among the States that have none.

Sir, there is no better economy than retrenchment, there is no wiser statesmanship than retrenchment, where expenditures are excessive and unnecessary. If the Congress to-day or to-morrow should reduce the Army to twenty thousand men, they would by that single step have withdrawn an imperative demand from the Treasury of the United States of thirty or forty million dollars; the $20,000,000 which is proposed by this provision to be distributed among the States that have less than their just proportion of circulating notes would be immediately and conveniently supplied; and the policy could go into operation without an increase of the circulation of the country, without any expansion, but simply by a just, wise, and proper economy in the reduction of the numbers of the Army.

I trust, Mr. President, that the honorable Senator from Vermont, or some other experienced and able member of the Senate, will put my amendment in proper shape. That Senator has given a great deal of attention and thought and labor to this subject and to similar subjects. It seems to me that the present state of things is anomalous, is unjust, and partial; that it favors some of the States beyond a judicious statesmanship in furnishing them with a redundant circulation, and it withholds from other States a necessary amount of wholesome circulation. This condition of things has been produced by the legislation and policy of Congress. They have the power and they ought to adopt steps and measures to reform it, to equalize the circulation among the States, not only for the benefit of the States that would receive a larger proportion of it, but the whole United States, and that without impairing that policy of retrenchment and reduction in the currency which, in my judgment, is one of the essential conditions to the return of specie payments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONKLING. Of course I shall vote for the principle of this amendment, as I indicated I should be glad to do yesterday before it was offered. I suggest, however, to the honorable Senator from Kentucky that if he wishes to test its strength fairly he ought to modify it so as to specify an amount. There is a criticism, perhaps as mere matter of composition, to be made on the amendment as it now stands, "that there shall be withdrawn from the States which have an excess." What shall be withdrawn? One listener might understand it to be the entire excess, whether it was needed or not; another might understand it to be so much as should be necessary. In any event it seems to me the amount ought to be specified. Therefore I suggest to the Senator to insert the words "the amount of $20,000,000." They will come in appropriately early in his amendment. Then we shall have precisely the proposition in bulk and amount that we have here, and the question will be fairly presented whether it shall be derived from an inflation, as proposed by the original proposition, or shall be derived, as the Senator from Kentucky proposes, by withdrawing it from the excess of those States now possessed of an excess.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand that the Senator proposes to modify my amendment so as to fix $20,000,000 as the amount of the withdrawals. I accept the modification.

Mr. CONKLING. Let the words "the amount of $20,000,000" come in after the word "Department" in the Senator's amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. Very well.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I shall vote for this amendment, but not for some of the reasons that have been assigned. Where the circulation of a country has the same value in every portion of it, its distribution over that country will depend upon the demands of commerce, and I do not think it is much more important, so far as the mere question of the supply of currency in a particular locality is concerned, whether the bank that issues the money is located in that locality or another locality, for currency being the uniform value over the country will float to those localities where there is the greatest demand for it. In other words, I do not think it more important that a bank shall be located in a particular city in order to furnish that city a currency, if the currency has uniform value, than it has that the mint which issues the gold shall be located in that particular city. The gold currency being coined in the city of Philadelphia finds its way as readily into the western country, if there be a demand for it, if commerce demands it, as if the mint were located in the West. But, sir, the business of banking under the national banking system is a very profitable business, and it is not just that a larger proportion shall be given to one section than to another. It is a question, in my judgment, of the profits to be realized by the citizens in the business of banking. For instance, the State of Massachusetts has $40,000,000, as I understand is the case, above her proportion, taking the population into consideration. Then she furnishes to the West in proportion to that excess the currency that the West must use in shipping its produce and its stock, and Massachusetts gets the profits from the western country of that banking business.

That is not just in my judgment. The bill having uniform value over the country floats to the West when the demands of commerce require it to be there; but New England having the banking business given to it by partial legislation, or by a partial execution of the law, is allowed to make many millions of profit over another section of the country. That is the reason, in my judgment, why the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky is a fair one and just.

Just how this shall be brought about of course Senators cannot decide, but what ought to be can be done. If the eastern States have an undue proportion of banking facilities that can be credit in some way. When the bills are returned they need not be issued again, and when there shall be a sufficient return an institution can be established in the West or in the South. But, sir, I am not going to vote for any bill that will extend in any amount the banking currency of the country. I have said, and I still am of the opinion, that the banking system as established under existing laws is a stupendous folly. If it be the business of the Government of the United States to furnish to the people of the country a paper currency I cannot see why that paper currency shall not be issued directly by the Treasury, with the credit of the Government stamped upon it, instead of this indirect system, which gives the credit to the bank because the bank has deposited in the Treasury the bonds of the nation.

The paper issued by the bank rests for its credit upon the bonds of the Government; in other words, the credit of the bank is based upon the credit of the Government; and in order to get that credit of the Government we are paying as a nation six per cent. in gold upon all the currency that has been issued. The wisdom of that I have never been able to see. I was not able to see it when it was adopted during the war. I could not see how that relieved the finances of the country. It was claimed by very wise men at the time that it did furnish relief. It seemed to me, and I am of the opinion still, that the credit of the Government being the basis of the credit of the bank, the issue might just as well be made directly by the Treasury without paying an interest.

Now, sir, for the use of the bank bills the people of the United States are paying in interest above twenty million dollars every year. For the use of some three hundred millions of bank paper to aid the commerce of the country the people are taxed to the amount of the interest on the bonds that stand as the basis of that banking business. Why should that be so? Why not issue directly from the Treasury of the United States the Treasury notes, and rest them directly upon the credit of the Government, and save that $20,000,000 annually of gold interest.

Mr. President, I would not be in favor of a sudden withdrawal of all the bank paper of the country. This must be brought about gradually. Instead of increasing the banking business of the country under the present policy and system, I am in favor, as rapidly as we can, of withdrawing from that system, and so far as it is the judgment of Congress that the Government ought to furnish a paper currency to the people, let it be furnished directly from the Treasury. Are these bank bills in higher credit with the people, do they furnish any greater aid to commerce than the Treasury notes issued directly?

This bill proposes an increase, to a small extent it is true, but it proposes an increase of the bank paper of the country. I shall not support that. I shall support the opposite policy of gradually, but as rapidly as we can, withdrawing from this system that taxes all the people for the paper currency that is furnished by the Government of the United States. That may be saved, and in a few years, instead of being taxed for a paper currency, we may have a paper currency not taxed, upon which the people do not pay a tax in the form of interest paid in gold upon bonds deposited in the Treasury.

Getting away from that system, and saving that burden upon the people, then, as is suggested by the Senator from Kentucky, reducing the expenses of the Army $50,000,000 a year, which is practicable, which is possible, which ought to be done at once, which ought to have been done during the last two years, and abandoning the expenditures for the Freedmen's Bureau, and returning to the legitimate business of this Government, we can bring the expenditures of this Government within the easy management of the people. I am grateful to the Senator from Kentucky for his suggestion of retrenchment in the direction to which he has referred. It can be made. I have examined it somewhat. The Army of the United States, instead of costing $100,000,000 a year, ought not to cost the people more than $50,000,000 a year. When we make these plain, simple, and easy reforms, I believe that the taxes upon the people need extend to but a very few articles. Reduce your tax upon whisky to one dollar per gallon and let it be collected, which is possible, which is practicable at that rate; and then a reasonable, fair, proper tax upon tobacco, and a few other articles and perhaps upon incomes, and the other interests of the people may be relieved from taxation.

Before the war, in 1860, the production of whisky in this country was about ninety million gallons a year. In the State of Indiana it was about nine millions; in Ohio about fifteen millions; in Illinois, about fifteen millions. The policy that has been adopted has destroyed that interest. Put the tax at a reasonable rate, at one dollar per gallon, and let us collect, say sixty, seventy, or eighty million dollars upon whisky, instead of twelve or thirteen millions under the present inefficient state of legislation, or the present failure in the executive department, and we shall have made a great advance toward the relief of the people.

Mr. President, I did not intend to discuss the question at any length, but simply to express my opposition to any extension of the present banking system, which in my judgment, is based upon a wrong policy.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I admire the skill displayed by the Senator from Indiana in the discussion of controverted political questions. I am often reminded, as I listen to that Senator, of the position of that famous down-easter, Colonel Ethan Spike, who declared that he was in favor of the Maine law but against its execution. [Laughter.] The Senator goes a little forward, then he backs a little. He bravely asserts his propositions, and then he cautiously qualifies and modifies them, so that he is for and against all the contested points relating to finance and currency before the country. Sir, this going for a thing and then backing on it, going a little this way and a little that way will hardly work out the solution of the financial problems before the country.

Sir, I shall vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky. I am opposed to any further expansion of the currency, either by the banks or by the issue of legal-tender notes. We have gone too far in the direction of expansion already for the productive interests of the country and the interests of the toiling men of the country. We have eight or ten million men engaged in the productive industries of the nation, and their weekly labor is worth seventy-five or one hundred million dollars. A few million dollars more or less imposed upon the nation in the form of taxation is of little consideration compared with a policy that shall bring a sound currency. An unsound, vicious currency may impose a loss of five hundred or one thousand million dollars a year. What, then, does a few million dollars annually amount to as a burden upon the nation, if it shall secure to us in two or three years the restoration of a sound currency?

It seems to me that sound policy, the permanent and enduring interests of all sections of the country, and especially the interests of the toiling millions require that the greenback circulation shall be reduced to an amount which can be redeemed and made equal to specie. Mr. Pendleton, now the champion of irredeemable paper money, declared in 1862, on the floor of the House, that the legal-tender notes were sent into the world stamped with irredeemability; that we put on them the mark of Cain, and like Cain they would go forth to be vagabonds and fugitives on the face of the earth. He declared that private ruin and public bankruptcy, either with or without repudiation, would inevitably follow the issuing of the greenbacks. There are those who would keep the stamp of irredeemability upon the legal-tender notes; there are those who would continue to send them forth to be vagabonds and fugitives on the earth, until repudiation should come. It seems to me to be the province of statesmanship to enter upon a policy that shall stamp redeemability upon the face of these greenbacks and make these vagabond and fugitive notes equal to the purest gold.

Sir, it is clear to me that what the people of the new States and the southern States need is banking capital, not the further issue of legal-tender notes by the Government. Banks established and managed in localities where active capital is required furnish the means of discounting local paper or of making the loans required for local interests. The Treasury of the United States will not go into the business of exchanging greenbacks for the notes of country traders, nor country money-borrowers.

I believe the present banking system of the United States is the best banking system the world ever saw. The first year of the war swept away seventy-nine banks in Illinois, thirty-nine banks in Wisconsin, and nearly all the banks in Michigan and Minnesota. The people of the Northwest and of the Southwest have been robbed under the old banking system of millions of dollars. The billholders of the national banks have not lost a single dollar by the failure of any of those banks. Ohio and Indiana had when the war opened, safe and well-managed banks. We had $125,000,000 of banking capital in New England. The national banking system was forced upon us. New York had a safe banking system and she was forced to give it up. The safety of the present banking system to the note-holders is demonstrated. No sooner does a bank fail than its notes rise above their par value.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the Senator know why the value of the notes rises when the bank fails?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is simply because the western banks then find an opportunity to go and buy them up, for the advantage of that circulation, which they ought to have without discount. There are banks in existence in the western States that have paid from ten to forty thousand dollars in New England and New York for the privilege of starting banks where ever banks there have failed.

Mr. WILSON. I understand that subject.

Mr. POMEROY. The banks of the West have been compelled to buy the circulation of New England and New York, and pay three and four per cent. for it.

Mr. COLE. Which they ought to have for nothing.

Mr. WILSON. Sir, I am opposed to increasing the circulation of legal-tender notes, and I am opposed to increasing the bank circulation. I desire to get to a specie-paying system at the earliest possible day consistent with safety; but it does not seem to me that we are doing anything in the direction of specie payments. On the contrary, it seems to me we are every day drifting further from it. This greenback policy means that we shall never come to it. It means that we shall impose upon the country an irredeemable paper currency, condemned by every man who ever wrote on banking, and every statesman in our own country or any other country. No man known as a financier in the Old World or in the New sustains the views expressed by the Senator from Indiana. An irredeemable paper currency issued by the Government has been condemned and is now condemned by financiers and statesmen. Alexander Hamilton pronounced the issuing of paper money by the Government "a seducing and dangerous expedient," "likely to be extended to a degree which would occasion an inflated and artificial state of things incompatible with the regular and prosperous course of political economy." Sir Robert Peel declared that "the effect of the State having the complete control of the circulating medium in its own hands would be most mischievous."

Sir, I am opposed to continuing, without any effort to change it, this irredeemable paper money system. It is a burden upon the productive industry of the country, it is a heavy burden upon toiling men. Rather than enter upon a system of further expansion, I would vote to reduce the amount of circulation the Government has accorded to Massachusetts.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator one question, if he will permit me, before he takes his seat.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to know why, to the workingman, the bill of a bank is more secure when it rests for its credit upon a Government bond than a note issued by the Treasury upon the faith of the Government?

Mr. WILSON. It makes no difference to the workingman whether he has a legal-tender note or the note of a national bank in his pocket, but it does make a difference to the workingman whether we have an irredeemable paper currency, or whether it be a currency redeemable in gold and silver on demand. The labor of the country demands a sound currency, a currency based upon gold and silver. We should enter at once upon a policy that shall give us at no distant day such a currency. Instead of entering upon it, we now propose, in order to give twenty millions of the currency of the national banks to the new States and the southern States, to expand the currency to that amount. Why not withdraw the circulation of legal-tender notes to the same amount we increase the circulation of the national bank notes? We have passed through a severe commercial crisis. The business interests of the country are improving. If we shall be blessed with good crops the business men of the country have the best reason to hope for a marked improvement in all departments of productive industry. The laboring men of the country, who have severely felt the pressure upon the business interests of the nation, are now looking to the future with renewed confidence and hope. Why, then, for the benefit of jobbers and speculators who fatten upon the misfortunes of the people, derange and disturb the monetary affairs of the country by entering upon a policy of expansion? I take no part in this work of increasing the amount of irredeemable paper money, nor of imposing new burdens upon labor.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I believe the proposition now before the Senate is one to modify the twenty-second section of the banking act so as to authorize an increase of the circulation notes of the national banks to the extent of $20,000,000. It is a very simple proposition; there is but very little in it; but gentlemen have gone outside of the question before the Senate, and they are discussing the effect upon property, upon real estate and personal property, the effect upon the wages of the laboring man, of a return to specie payments. No part or parcel of the discussion, it seems to me, with due deference to the gentlemen who have entered into it, has anything to do with the proposition before the Senate.

The original banking act made the limit of $300,000,000 to the circulation notes of the banks. I never saw any use in it; I never saw any sense in it; because banking, in my judgment, ought to be left like any other business, perfectly free. If we bank under the national system let us bank as they banked in New York. I believe there was no limitation upon the number of banks or upon the amount of circulation there.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg to dissent from the Senator's proposition. In New York there was this check: one half of all the basis of banking must consist of stocks of the State, the amount of which stocks was fixed, and by the constitution could never be enlarged except by the consent of the whole people expressed in a positive vote.

Mr. HENDERSON. That, I suppose, left banking to be carried on to the extent of the entire stocks of the State of New York, only one half of the basis of the circulating medium being required to be of New York stocks.

Mr. CONKLING. But the whole debt of the State was very small.

Mr. HENDERSON. Was it fixed by the constitution?

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, certainly; it was practically fixed.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask the Senator, then, if a circulation could not have been based in New York under that very banking system upon coin instead of stocks? Were there not banks existing even under the very banking law of New York whose circulation was based upon coin and not upon stocks? Certainly there were. There was no limitation upon the amount of circulation. Banks might be established ad libitum, just whenever any person wanted to establish a bank, under the banking system of New York. That is my recollection. I am aware there was what is called a free banking law of New York, requiring, as the Senator says, a deposit with the register of the State of a certain character of public stocks, one half of which, I believe, as he states, should be stocks of New York, and the other half of which should be stocks of other States; but that did not prevent, under the laws of New York, any man from banking upon coin. He had a perfect right to bank upon coin and to issue large credits on the coin in the vaults of the bank. In other words, there never was a limitation in the State of New York upon the amount of the circulating medium.

Why, Mr. President, under the old system of banking, it was very rare, indeed, for any State to have any limitation upon the amount of circulating notes. Anybody complying with the terms of the banking laws of the State might go on and bank. Was there ever any reason in establishing this national system, and coercing, as my friend from New York said so ably here yesterday, all the State banks to go out of existence, for putting on this limitation? I understood perfectly well why the limitation was put on at the time. Why was it? It was because at that time we had not less than from eight to fifteen hundred million dollars of circulating medium issued by the Government upon Government credit. We had the greenbacks; we had the compound-interest notes; we had the certificates of indebtedness; we had every variety and form and shape of indebtedness, which constituted a circulating medium; some being a legal tender, and others not a legal tender. The fear was that in the establishment of the national banks we might increase to a very dangerous extent the circulating medium, and hence it was thought advisable at that time to put a limitation upon the national notes.

Is there any cause for it at this time? We have largely reduced that circulating medium based upon Government credit. It is out of the way. A large quantity of the greenback circulation has been removed. Nearly all of the compound-interest notes are gone; I believe not exceeding twenty-five or thirty million dollars of them are outstanding at present. They will all soon be out of the way. All this vast amount of circulating medium issued upon the credit of the Government in the shape of seven-thirties, small notes, and other interest-bearing notes, and some of them non-interest-bearing have now disappeared, and the currency of the country has been largely reduced.

And let it be remembered, Mr. President, in connection with the reduction of the currency, that we have largely increased the population that use it. It must be remembered that at the time the currency was so expanded, eleven of the States, ten of them at any rate, because a part of the State of Tennessee was under our control, a large portion of the Union at that time did not use our circulating medium at all, neither the national notes nor the bank notes. Since that time we have conquered a mighty nation; we have conquered eleven States and blotted out the entire circulating medium that they had, and we have substituted ours for it, thereby giving a larger basis for the operation of this circulating medium, giving at least nine million people, turning the slaves into freemen, who are now demanding a circulation, demanding money in this shape, just like the white people of the northern States. They are operating for themselves. They are laborers, they are mechanics, they are merchants, they are doing business like the whites of the South. A vast amount of money is needed for that nine or ten million people; and yet we have gone on contracting the circulation.

The great idea here seems to be to have an early return to specie payments. I do not object to it. I should be a heretic if I were to say that I doubt the policy of a speedy return to specie payments. I am almost afraid to say it. I have got enough on my shoulders already, and if I were to say that, I suppose I never should survive. Every Senator seems to think that the age of happiness will be when we have returned to specie payments; commerce will revive; manufactures will be better than they were before; and agriculture will prosper beyond anything known before. I do not believe a word of it; and I do not want to force a state of affairs, the expediency of which I doubt. I doubt very much whether we shall be any better off under a reign of specie payments than we are at present. I have not time to go into the reasons for this extraordinary statement. I have no doubt it sounds very heretical to a great many of my hearers, if they pay any attention to it at all. But, Mr. President, reasons can be given why in all probability we are better off without this Elysium of specie payments. I am old enough (and not very old at that) to know that commerce and business did not thrive under the reign of specie payments any better than they do now; and every Senator knows perfectly well that such is the case. Do you not know that under specie payments we had commercial and financial revulsions every eight or ten years to such an extent that people often said when a period of prosperity was upon us, that it is the beginning, or the indication, the symptom indeed of financial crisis and financial difficulty? And everybody knows that it has come upon us again and again. The Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] smiles. Certainly he can smile; but when we go back to specie payments again, we shall find the same financial difficulties existing.

Mr. CONKLING. I will retract my smile if the Senator wishes me to do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON. As the smile is withdrawn, I will proceed.

Now, Mr. President, to return to the proposition before the Senate, I do not wish to discuss these other matters—it is a proposition to enable the States that are without banking facilities, on account of the limitation imposed by the twenty-second section of the banking act upon circulation notes, to extend their circulation $20,000,000. Gentlemen say at once that this is a proposition to expand the currency. The Senator from Ohio answered that very properly when he said that it was no such proposition at all. How does the Senator from Massachusetts make clear his proposition that this necessarily expands the currency? He said it was an expansion, and he wanted to live in the ancient ways of his fathers and did not want to move either one way or the other; he did not want to disturb the currency. He has got $356,000,000 of greenback circulation out; but he would not take in a dime of it. He does not want to contract, and he does not want to expand. We have just got in that glorious fix with $356,000,000 of greenbacks out and $300,000,000 of circulating notes of banks, and that is the Elysium. He does not want to move—

Mr. WILSON. The Senator will allow me to say that I would reduce it at least $20,000,000 and resume specie payments immediately.

Mr. HENDERSON. How would you reduce it?

Mr. WILSON. I would fund it.

Mr. HENDERSON. Fund it in what?

Mr. WILSON. In bonds of the Government.

Mr. HENDERSON. Bonds of what sort? Mr. WILSON. Of the Government of the United States.

Mr. HENDERSON. Six per cent. bonds?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir; or five per cent., or anything I could get it at.

Mr. HENDERSON. Gold-bearing bonds?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON. Would the Senator do that—fund these notes of the Government called greenbacks into a six per cent. security and then not extend this limitation, so that banking could exist in any of the States?

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator desires an answer, I will say this; if I had my way I would reduce the greenbacks to a point at which we could redeem them, and maintain that redemption. I would adopt free banking. I agree with the Senator in that; and I would have the banks redeem their circulation.

Mr. HENDERSON. They do redeem it now.

Mr. WILSON. That is, I would enter on a system that would bring that about in the course of a year or two.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not pretend to say that I would contract the greenback circulation at all. I am willing that Senators shall enter this Elysian field of specie payments. It is a myth, a humbug, and always was. It has never been otherwise in this country; and the Senator knows it as well as I do.

Mr. WILSON. It so happens that every man in the world with a knowledge of finance disagrees with the Senator.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator knows perfectly well that the banks in this country suspended specie payments in 1837. He knows that they suspended specie payments in 1847. He knows that again in 1857 they suspended specie payments; and he knows perfectly well that they did so in 1861 and remained suspended for years, when their paper went to a discount much larger than the apparent premium on gold today. What sort of an Elysium was it? He knows perfectly well what it was. The Senator was in business, I presume, during those days, I suppose as early as 1837; and he remembers the state of affairs that existed in this country from 1837 to 1843, and again in 1847, in 1857, and in 1861. We suspended in 1861 and have remained suspended, State banks and all, from that day to this; and the Senator will find out when we get back to specie payment it will not last six months. I prophesy that our Government will be in the condition that the English Government was in 1816. They passed an act of Parliament declaring they would resume specie payments in 1816, I believe. After the close of the war with France, and Waterloo was fought, the English Government supposed they could go back to specie payments immediately, having been suspended for over a quarter of a century. What was the success? They passed their act. Some Senator said yesterday fix a day—I think it was my friend from Indiana—

Mr. MORTON. I did not say that.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then I take that back; but some Senator said, "Fix a day for the resumption of specie payment and work up to it."

Mr. MORTON. I said that, but I was not speaking of the Bank of England.

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly not; but you would fix a day here, and that is just what the English Government did. They thought when the war closed with great glory to the Government that prosperity and everything else would come upon the resumption of specie payments. Why, sir, the English Government were enabled to carry on the war with Napoleon simply because they suspended specie payments, and never could have done it otherwise. Every man who knows anything of the history of that Government, knows perfectly well that it would have been utterly impracticable for them to carry that war through on the basis of specie.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to ask the Senator this question: when the final resumption by the Bank of England took place was it not in consequence of the English Government having fixed a period of three years within which to resume, and did not the bank resume in a year and a half?

Mr. HENDERSON. If the Senator wants my opinion, I give it in this way: the English Government fixed a time again and again; they fixed on the year 1816 for resuming; and what was the result? The premium on gold increased immediately on the passage of the act instead of diminishing, and when the day for resumption came they had produced a monetary distress in the country that had not existed for ten years preceding. They then fixed 1818 for resumption; and what was the result? They brought another monetary panic in that country. They then fixed 1820 and again 1822; and the history of the times will disclose the fact that every effort on their part resulted in new disasters. Go back to the history of that time, and you will find that such is the fact. Why? Simply because you cannot bring about specie payments by an edict of Parliament or Congress.

Mr. WILSON. They got to a specie basis there at some time.

Mr. HENDERSON. They got there before the expiration of the last term, as the Senator from Indiana properly states. They did fix the time again in 1824 or 1825, and before the time arrived they did resume specie payments, but they resumed it upon the increasing business of the country, upon the revival of industry, and upon other things that bring about specie payments, not upon the act of Parliament. So it will be here. We shall resume specie payment when the business of the country justifies it and when our productions are more than equal to our importations. When we have built up foreign balances and can draw upon those foreign balances, and can increase our circulating medium in the precious metals in this country, then we shall resume specie payments, not before. The precious metals have departed; they are not in the country; and it is idle to talk about resuming specie payments until the revival of business, commercial prosperity, agricultural prosperity, and mechanical prosperity shall have put large balances abroad to our credit. It cannot be done otherwise.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to ask the Senator if the demand for gold is not governed by the ordinary law of supply and demand; and while there is no demand in this country for gold except to pay duties, I ask him if gold will not continue to go out of the country? There is no demand for gold now except for the purpose of paying duties, and therefore gold does not stay here, but goes where it is used as currency, where it is demanded for other purposes besides duties.

Mr. HENDERSON. I thought gold was very much in demand. I have not heard a Senator make a speech on this subject who did not crave a return to specie payments. Every Senator seems to look forward with as much delight to that happy period as he would to the haven of rest before him. I cannot see that former times justify the belief of Senators that we are going to have such prosperous times when we do return to specie payments, because we have had financial difficulties and panics, as I have shown, during periods of specie payments and necessity brought us to a suspension of specie payments. It will not be a year after we have resumed specie payments before an act of Congress will be passed justifying a suspension of specie payments. You will see an act of Congress passed in less than twelve months after resumption, justifying or legalizing the action of the banks in suspending specie payments.

You talk about resuming specie payments! What are you going to resume with? The little coin you have got in the Treasury—$100,000,000? What will be the result? You have $356,000,000 of greenbacks out. Then, I suppose, we shall rush to the Government vaults and draw that out. The banks will do it, of course, in order to resume themselves. How much money have they got? They have not over fifteen or twenty million dollars in their vaults and $300,000,000 out. How are they going to resume? Is there coin enough to do it? Surely not. What will be the result? You will have a discount on paper instead of having a premium on gold and a uniform value to your paper throughout the country, both greenbacks and circulating notes, and they are worth just as much in Missouri as they are in New York to-day. Your paper is now perfectly uniform, though it is depreciated. I admit it is depreciated, but it is uniform; but it will not be uniform after that occurs; and do you not know it? You then set shaving shops to work from one end of this land to the other. Why? Because instead of having a premium on gold you have a discount upon paper, and it is exactly the same, and you will have to legalize your suspension or every national bank will be wound up. When you have taken up your greenbacks and canceled them, and the national banks have suspended specie payment, I should like to see the glorious haven of rest you have entered. What is the use of gentlemen talking otherwise? Do they not know that such will be the case?

This is a plain, practical view of this question, and every man of business interests or doing business in the country knows it. What is the use of disguising it, what is the use of trying to conceal the fact, and with a five-cent piece in our pocket swearing to the world that we are rich? There is not a word of truth in it. We are not rich. We have been engaged for five or six years in destroying property. We have destroyed hundreds and thousands of millions of property. We have been compelled to take the laboring men from the plows and workshops throughout the country and send them into the Army to defend the Union. That was all right enough; but you cannot take a million men for five or six years and keep them occupied in destroying property, abandoning all the industries of the country, and still remain rich.

Mr. WILSON. Does the Senator mean to say that we have not as much wealth now as before the war?

Mr. HENDERSON. I mean to say that we have not as much wealth per capita now as before the war. I heard the Senator on that point; I know all about his views. He has a bloated state of affairs. He has blown a bladder up in the New England States and thinks he is rich. I know exactly what he is; I know exactly what the New England people are. I know they have accumulated very largely, and did accumulate during the war, because of their situation. You had not this war on your own soil as we had in Missouri. We were engaged in destroying each other's property—necessarily so engaged. Civil war was upon our soil, and we were destroying each other, and destroying each other's property. You were not doing so in New England. You were carrying on your workshops and supplying the Army. You were supplying knapsacks; you were supplying harness; you were supplying guns; you were supplying every article used by the Army; and you sold at enormous rates. You sold to the Government at three and four prices, did you not? You had the capital of the country. What little we had was destroyed. You took bonds at forty cents on the dollar; and now, having them in your pocket, you come to Congress and say, "Gentlemen, we must resume specie payments." Why did you not talk about doing business on the specie basis during the war? Why did you insist upon selling a set of harness for a cavalry horse to us at ninety dollars, when at the old prices we could have bought it at thirty dollars; and you know it.

You insisted on so selling, and did so sell to the Army. We had to give our obligations to you for ninety dollars for an article really not worth over thirty-five dollars. Now, immediately after that is done, and you have got the compensation in your pocket in the shape of a Government bond, you come before the country and say, "Yes, you have got a limitation of $300,000,000 on national banking, and you must withdraw the greenbacks, take them out of the question," and immediately upon doing that you know you come to suspension, and the country will be bankrupt. You say, "I cannot help that; I have got a bond and want to appreciate it to par." We will see what it will be worth after you have done it. That will depreciate instead of appreciating it. It will depreciate everything in the country; and every man knows it. Why? Because you have produced a monetary panic, which always depreciates property and always depreciates bonds and everything else.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the Senator if there is not more taxable property to-day in the State of Missouri than there was in 1860?

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. Is it not so in every loyal State of the Union?

Mr. HENDERSON. No, sir.

Mr. WILSON. And measured by the gold standard, too?

Mr. HENDERSON. No, sir.

Mr. WILSON. The loyal States are worth at least $4,000,000,000 more than they were in 1860.

Mr. HENDERSON. All the loyal States taken together?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, all the loyal States together are worth $4,000,000,000 more than in 1860, and that, too, on the gold basis.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not talking about the aggregate wealth. I spoke of the wealth per capita a little while ago. I know that population has increased. There has been an immense immigration to this country. The Senator must recollect that in 1860 our population was thirty-one millions, and now it must be in the neighborhood of forty millions. I apprehend that there is a greater aggregate wealth; but the Senator knows perfectly well that in all the seceding States there has been not only a destruction of $500,000,000 of property, but there has been a depreciation of $500,000,000 more. He knows that land worth fifty and seventy-five dollars an acre previous to the war is now selling for two dollars and a half and five dollars; and a very slow sale at that. In regard to the seceding States, I know they brought these consequences upon themselves; they are but the penalty of their own corrupt doings; I will not justify them; but to deny that there is a depreciation of property is idle and useless. The Senator knows to the contrary.

But, Mr. President, I have nothing to do now with the aggregate wealth nor the per capita wealth of the country. I am simply talking about this measure. Why is it that we cannot get a vote upon it? I have been led off by the very singular remarks of such gentlemen as my friend on my right [Mr. CONKLING] and others into discussing the entire question. They must discuss everything, and when you get to talking about it you must follow them on. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] is very well calculated to lead a gentleman off from almost anything. He has rambled wonderfully on this question.

Now, Mr. President, all that we have before us is the proposition of my worthy friend, the chairman of the committee, who very modestly asks that you permit these southern States that have no banking capital at all under the act, because they were not in the Union at the time, to establish banking capital on which to base a circulating medium of $20,000,000. I do not care whether you defeat it or not. The fact is, I believe, upon a reconsideration, I would rather you would do it than not. Go on with this sort of work; it is not going to hurt anybody. At the next session of Congress you will do what I desired to do in the beginning of this, and we ought to have been attending to it instead of other business. We ought to have been regulating the finances of the country; but we were specially engaged in the discharge of another important duty. We should have made banking perfectly free, and let every man bank who has the bonds of the Government to deposit.

Mr. President, who told this Congress, who communicated the wisdom to this Congress to enable them to know exactly how much circulating medium the business of this country demands? It is wisdom beyond that of Solomon. It is wisdom beyond anything I can conceive of. With twenty million people we needed a circulating medium of $1,500,000,000 you said, and you issued it to the people, and you forced it upon them by calling it a legal tender in payment of debts. Now, you will not permit the small sum of $20,000,000 to be given where they have no banking capital, with the obligation on their part to redeem in the lawful money of the Government, when we have intimations that the Supreme Court will decide the legal-tender clause of your greenback circulation to be void and of no effect.

That brings us to specie payments at once. We see what will be the result of it. We see what sort of a fix the country will be placed in. It will require legislation. We ought to prepare for it now. If gentlemen are really sincere about desiring to return to specie payments, how do they expect to come to it? Must you not come to it through the medium of banks, by having banks in every part of the country to collect coin for the purpose of meeting their obligations? Can the Government go on collecting coin to prepare for specie payments? Attempt that, and you will have your people clamoring for the sale of gold. Whenever there is any large accumulation of gold in the Treasury there is a clamor for the Secretary of the Treasury to put gold upon the market so as to bring gold down. If the Secretary of the Treasury does not put it on the market, gold goes up; but just as soon as the Secretary sells a little gold in New York, gold goes down; and it is because of this clamor that he is compelled to keep the premium on gold down as far as possible. We can only resume specie payments through the medium of the banks, just as the Senator from Ohio very modestly proposed. I did not want to adopt any such system, but I was compelled to do it. I have been compelled to yield. The Finance Committee insist that we cannot go into free banking at this session. Why? It is dangerous to talk about finance anyhow, dangerous to talk about taxation, and there is danger in everything.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish my friend to misrepresent the Finance Committee. The Finance Committee occupy no such position. They brought these questions deliberately before the Senate, and have asked the attention of the body to them, but have been voted down every time.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not talking about the Finance Committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. You said "the Finance Committee."

Mr. HENDERSON. I am talking about the Senate. Does not the Senator know that the Senate has taken this ground?

Mr. SHERMAN. I agree that the Senate has, but the Finance Committee has not.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Finance Committee did not; but every member of the Finance Committee in the Senate I supposed so voted. Did not the Senator from Ohio so vote?

Mr. SHERMAN. Vote how?

Mr. HENDERSON. Vote to ignore financial questions at this session.

Mr. SHERMAN. I beg leave to say that I do not think any member of the committee voted to ignore the financial questions. They did their duty in bringing forward those questions, but could not get the Senate to act on them.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am talking of the action of the Senate, not of the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know any member of the Finance Committee who in the Senate refused to consider these questions.

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, Mr. President, when any question was discussed as to the propriety of taking up financial measures at this session I heard no opposition from members of the Finance Committee in the Senate to the conclusion arrived at. If the Senator wants my opinion I will say that I am justified by the identical bill he now reports; I voted for him to report it, but I have a right to comment on it, and I will comment on it.

Gentlemen talk about the people of the West. Why should the people of my State be compelled to stand by and listen to such a speech as the Senator from Massachusetts has made, with his pocket full of bonds, insisting that the greenbacks shall be withdrawn, and that nobody shall have an increase of the circulating medium; that he has got an iron rule fixed upon us, and that the West must submit to it; that we shall have no more circulation, and all we ever get we must pay ten per cent. for to some bank in New England that will agree to surrender—

Mr. WILSON. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator's speech, but I have said nothing of the kind. I said nothing about bonds.

Mr. HENDERSON. You offered to surrender some of the circulating medium of Massachusetts. You have that circulating medium in Massachusetts, and of course you must have deposited bonds for it.

Mr. WILSON. I offered to take $10,000,000 of Massachusetts and give it to you.

Mr. HENDERSON. Has the Senator any interest in national banks? How many banks does he own in Massachusetts?

Mr. WILSON. Me personally?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON. If it will be any service to the gentleman, I will tell him that I have not a dollar in any national bank, and I have no bonds of the Government; and if the gentleman wishes me to go further, I can tell him that I have not $500 of any kind of property on earth. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON. Then I ask the Senator how it is that he offers to give up his $10,000,000 of the circulating medium of Massachusetts? He is like a certain individual who offered the whole world on one occasion when he did not own an inch of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON. I am the representative in the Senate in part of the State of Massachusetts; and I think I know something of her sentiments, of her opinions, and of her interests; and it will be far wiser to take these $20,000,000 from the existing banks, although a considerable portion of it would come upon my own State, than to increase at this time the amount of paper money circulating in the country, and I shall so vote, regarding this as a less evil than the other. Now, I hope the Senator understands my position on this subject.

Mr. HENDERSON. Well—

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I would like to ask the Senator from Missouri a question.

Mr. HENDERSON. That will relieve me from answering the Senator from Massachusetts, and it is utterly impossible for me to do it, for I do not understand him.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. The question I wish to put springs from the position the Senator has taken here. I understand it to be the same position taken by the Senator from Indiana, that money, like water, flows to the lower level, the place where it is wanted, and it makes little difference whether you have a bank in New England or at the West, the money will go where it is wanted.

Mr. HENDERSON. I took no such position.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Did not the Senator take a position in favor of free banking?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Under a system of free banking if New England, either by her option or by the force of the Government, were to invest her surplus capital in banking, what business would you have to take that vested right and her invested property away from her and force it into another section of the country, any more than you would have a right to take out of the manufacturing establishments of New England the capital which is invested in making cloth?

Mr. HENDERSON. I fully agree with the Senator that we have no more right to do it; but the Senator from Massachusetts makes the proposition, and he has no more right to do it than I have.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I understood the Senator from Missouri a moment ago to complain of the Senator from Massachusetts because he did not assent to taking the bank stock from Massachusetts and giving it to the West.

Mr. HENDERSON. No, sir; the Senator from Massachusetts knows better than that. The Senator from New Hampshire was half asleep. [Laughter.] I noticed him; he paid no attention. I knew very well he did not understand it.

Mr. CAMERON. May I ask the Senator from Missouri to allow me to make a motion?

Mr. HENDERSON. A motion for what?

Mr. CAMERON. It is to this effect: that to-day and hereafter the Senate will adjourn at four o'clock. I do not make the motion to interrupt business; but I think it will be more agreeable to ourselves, more beneficial to the country, and perhaps we shall expedite business, if we adjourn at a fixed hour every day.

Mr. HENDERSON. In order to make this long speech of my friend short, I object to being interrupted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri is not to be interrupted but by his consent; and I hope he will not consent. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON. I by no means consent, because I am now in the midst of a speech that will, perhaps, not close until five o'clock.

Mr. CAMERON. I hope to God it will not last much longer. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON. I have known many hopes entertained by my friend that have never been realized, and perhaps this is not the last. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I have sat here patiently desiring a vote on this proposition. I now desire a vote upon it. I do not wish to prolong this debate. I have certainly not participated in it heretofore, and I did not intend to participate in it; but when such extraordinary views are expressed as I have heard here to-day I feel it my duty to notice them. Perhaps from the indications I see around me I misunderstood what the Senator from Pennsylvania said just now.

Mr. CAMERON. Does the Senator desire that I shall repeat what I said?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, as Senators generally seem to be very much amused.

Mr. CAMERON. The Senator said that he had not made a long speech and did not desire to occupy the time of the Senate, but it might take him until five o'clock to get through with his remarks. I said in reply that I hoped to God he would not occupy much more time than he had already done upon this subject?

Mr. HENDERSON. At this session?

Mr. CAMERON. To-day.

Mr. HENDERSON. Oh! Well, Mr. President, I do not know that I have occupied a great deal of the time of the Senate recently. I always listen with a great deal of pleasure to the Senator from Pennsylvania, and I think he has occupied much more of the time of this body than I have. I think generally I hear him every day when I am here. Surely I have not participated in any debates here for the last two or three weeks. I have said nothing in the body during that time. For two or three weeks past I have certainly not attempted to make a speech or a remark on any subject.

Mr. CAMERON. May I ask the Senator from Missouri whether there is any special reason why he has made no speech the last few weeks?

Mr. HENDERSON. I am making a speech now because of the fact that I have heard views expressed here yesterday and to-day that I could not, as a representative of any part of the West, listen to without replying to them. I see perfectly well what is to be the result; it is to make the people of the West pay this public debt; and everybody else can see it. You are holding a depreciated debt now which was contracted with a depreciated currency, and the proposition is to resume specie payments instantly, and every Senator seems to fall into it; and almost every Senator I have heard speak derives the idea of stopping the contraction of the greenbacks, whose contraction we suspended a short time ago, during this very session of Congress, by a large majority. Senators seem to condemn the action of the Senate and House of Representatives which stopped contraction on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury; and now almost all demand that at least there shall be no further expansion, and that in the course of a short time these depreciated notes shall be funded in a six per cent. gold-bearing debt. I am opposed to it. I suppose I shall be left almost alone here; but I can tell Senators they will never carry a portion of the people of this country upon any such proposition. A large proportion of them will see to it that no such proposition shall be carried, because I believe the people entertain correct views in reference to this matter.

But, Mr. President, as I said in the beginning, I do not wish to enter into these questions, because they are questions that do not legitimately belong to the discussion of the bill under consideration. The measure before us is a proposition to enable States to have a circulating medium which now have none. It does not propose to take from New England anything according to the view of the Senator from New Hampshire. I do not propose to take a dollar from Massachusetts, and I do not believe we have a right to do it. I do not propose to take from Rhode Island and Connecticut, because it would injure the business of those States. I do propose however to pass this bill though it does not satisfy me. If I had my way I would take off the limitation entirely and let us bank freely anywhere. Let us do that, and then if you want to withdraw the greenback circulation you can do it; and do you not arrive at specie payments the moment you do it?

The Senator from Massachusetts says we must not take off the limitation, but must go on funding the greenbacks until we get them down to $200,000,000. Why, sir, the country will be bankrupt before we reach it. Why not take off the limitation first, and then go on to reduce the greenback circulation, if you want to arrive at specie payments? Do not produce a pressure without providing a means of relieving the community; and then, if they complain, all they have to do is to deposit bonds and take out circulating notes, and the very moment the greenbacks are reduced to $250,000,000 my impression is that you have arrived at specie payments. That is just what I would do; I would take the limitation off national banking, I would have none upon it, and then if you want specie payments proceed to withdraw the greenback circulation, and by that process of course you arrive at specie payments. Whether it is going to do us any good to come to specie payments as suddenly as some gentlemen suppose is necessary, is another question that I do not propose to go into now; but at the proper time I think I can show some reasons why it is not expedient with the present condition of our industries in this country to attempt anything of the sort. It will only result in disaster and monetary ruin.

Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate much longer, as I promised my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania and others that I would not do so. I rose merely to protest against the views expressed by several gentlemen, because they seemed to be almost unanimously concurred in by Senators all over the House, or at least I have heard no dissent, although we adopted the contrary policy in the beginning of the session. Everybody now seems to be for specie payments. Some want to cancel the greenbacks, some want to fund them in bonds at six per cent.; but everybody wants to get rid of them. Sir, I am opposed to any such policy. The Senate may overrule me, but they will not try it a great while. I am willing to reduce gradually, but I am never willing to reduce until you take the limitation entirely off banking and make it free, so that the people of the country may relieve themselves whenever you undertake this pressure of the withdrawal of greenbacks.

Mr. MORTON. I wish to understand if the Senator's proposition is to make banking free, and then allow the banks to redeem their issues in paper money instead of gold and silver?

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator asks me if that is my intention. I will read the proviso to the bill which I had the pleasure of reporting from the Finance Committee, and it will show him what my proposition was. The bill was to make banking free, to repeal the twenty-second section of the banking law entirely, and then it was accompanied by this proviso:

Provided, That whenever the amount of United States notes and circulating notes of national banks combined shall be in excess of $700,000,000 the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to retire and cancel as rapidly as possible United States notes to the extent of such excess, until the whole amount of United States notes outstanding shall be reduced to $250,000,000.

I was authorized by the Finance Committee to report that bill in the early part of the session. It does not express my views, because I would put on no limitation; but the Committee on Finance supposed it would be proper to put a limitation of $700,000,000. That was saying, "Open the door to banking; let everybody bank as he chooses; but as banks increase, and the circulating medium of the banks—national notes—go into circulation, the Secretary of the Treasury shall retire the United States notes in that proportion, leaving at all times $700,000,000 out." That was the proposition reported. It would at least make banking free. That would be an infinitely better proposition than this; but I go for this because it is just as far as it goes. It is just to the States that have not now their proper proportion of national circulation; and I do not want to derange the monetary affairs and the commercial business of the New England States or of New York. New York has more than her share of national bank notes.

Mr. CONKLING. No.

Mr. HENDERSON. I say that since her banks have adopted the national system New York has more of the national circulation than her population entitles her to; but suppose we should undertake to withdraw seven or eight or ten millions of the circulating medium from New York under legislation such as my friend from Kentucky proposes, what effect would it have on business in New York? My friend from New York [Mr. CONKLING] is too good a financier not to know that it would derange business in that great city very much. My friend from Massachusetts, who talks of giving up $10,000,000 from the manufacturing industry of New England, because the Massachusetts banks have their circulation all over New England, does not for a moment contemplate what sort of effect it would have on the business interests of that section of the country? The proposition of my friend from Kentucky is all wrong; the true remedy is to take down the bars, take off the limit, and let banking be free like all other business.

Mr. President, suppose you reduce the greenback circulation $100,000,000 more, leaving it only $256,000,000, would not every Senator feel that we should have approached within a few cents on the dollar of a specie standard? Why? Because with a free-banking system almost every dollar of the greenbacks would be required in the reserve banks, and whenever the whole amount of United States notes is required as a reserve in the national banks, specie payments come as a matter of course, because there are then no greenbacks in circulation, and the greenbacks held by the banks answer the purpose of gold. It is only, I repeat, through the medium of the banks that you can come to specie payments at all.

Mr. President, I hope this bill will be passed, and I am astonished that any opposition should be presented to it. It is but a measure of justice to the States which have no bank capital, and can have none under the laws of Congress. We find the people without any bank facilities. We have killed the State banks by act of Congress, put them out of existence, forced them to that Procrustean bed of which my friend from New York spoke yesterday. It is impossible for them to bank. Now you insist upon preventing the State banks from doing anything, and also insist upon putting a limitation of $300,000,000 upon the national banks. Is there any justice in it; any reason in it? There is none except this idea of forcing specie payments. Go on with your hot-bed system, and see what it will result in. You will see what sort of specie payments you will have without specie and $600,000,000 to pay. Make any attempt to do it, and the business and industry of the country will come to disaster and ruin.

Mr. President, it does not expand the currency a dollar to pass this bill. You have to redeem. It only requires that a larger amount of the United States notes shall enter into the reserves of the banks; a larger part of the greenback circulation will be absorbed as a reserve, and although you increase this circulating medium it has the effect simply to give facilities where facilities are needed; and if the people of the South need these facilities at home, it will only result in putting back into the banks of New England, and of New York and Pennsylvania, the same amount there. Gentlemen seem to suppose that if the banks have paper somebody will rush there and borrow it at eight or ten or twelve per cent. for the mere purpose of having money in his pocket. Senators should not imagine that people are generally so short sighted as that. People do not borrow money from banks unless they want money. If my friend from New York would only consider for a moment that a large portion of the bank notes of New York are now circulating in the southern States, and that the result of this establishment of facilities in the South will only have the effect to put the banks nearer to the people of the South where they can get accommodation, I think he will be reconciled to it. How would a man from Richmond do in the city of New York borrowing money, where he has to give a couple of indorsers? I apprehend he would have some difficulty in doing it. He is unknown; his neighbors and friends are unknown. He wants the facilities in Richmond. So a man in New Orleans wants the facilities there; he does not want to go to Boston to borrow money; his indorsers are not known there; his bill of exchange cannot be sold to the Boston bank. The result of this movement will simply be that you put the circulating medium where it is needed and where the people can be accommodated at their own doors, where the indorsers are known, and where their paper can be discounted; and it will simply result in putting back into the New England banks that redundancy of circulation not needed and which is now circulating in the southern States.

Mr. President, it is but just to the people of the South, it is but just to the people of the States which have no circulating medium. Why is it that gentlemen insist on an irredeemable circulation issued in their own States, a forced loan to the people who cannot have bank stock themselves? How just is it to force your currency on them, irredeemable as it is, making a loan upon the people of every other State of the Union, and you yourselves receiving interest on it? Why not let the people who have to borrow receive the dividends on the banks. They cannot get stock in your banks, and if they could, it would not do them any good, because, as I said before, they could not get accommodation from your bank counters. Let the accommodations be among the people who want them. Let them own the stock. Is that anything more than just and right? Surely not.

Senators need not imagine that people will go to a bank and borrow for the mere glory of having money in their pockets. Let us trust the people as we trust ourselves. We are not fond of paying six or ten per cent. for money for the mere privilege of having it idle in our pockets. A man does not borrow usually unless he wants it in business, and when he does want it in business, in the name of common sense give him facilities near his door, where those who indorse his paper are known. Is there anything wrong or unjust in this? Surely it does not extend the circulation a dollar.

If you mean to take off the limitation entirely and let banking be perfectly free, there would not be an expansion of a single dollar. The people will not borrow money unless they want it; and if they do not want it there will be no expansion, and the banks are not likely to put out any more than the people demand, because bankers know perfectly well that they have to redeem what they put out either in what you call United States notes or in gold; and when the Supreme Court comes to decide that the legal-tender clause is void that very moment the banks find nothing to be lawful currency of the United States except gold, and they will have to redeem their entire paper in that.

Hence the banks are very cautious, at least during the present year. They must be very cautious in putting out paper in the face of any probability or even possibility of a decision of that sort. My friend from Oregon, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] I believe, has argued the case before the Supreme Court; the case is pending there to be decided at the beginning of the next term. But even if the Supreme Court should not decide in that way, the disposition of Congress seems to be to fund the greenbacks; to cancel them, to get them out of the way. If that be done, what can the banks redeem in except coin? Are they likely, in view of the prospect of being compelled to redeem in coin, to put out any more paper than the business demands of the country require? Surely not. Then why is it that Senators insist that this is a proposition to expand the currency. I repeat again, and I want the people to understand, that the proposition of gentlemen simply is to force specie payments by denying a circulating medium to the people, and whenever you get specie payments in that way you bring disaster and ruin on the country.

Mr. CORBETT. It seems that this is not a question of circulation in the West, but a question of the profits of the banks. It resolves itself right to that point. If a man has the money to establish a bank in the western country he must go East to purchase the bonds on which to issue his bank currency. If the West now have the currency to establish banks with $20,000,000 of circulation what will be the result? Take, for illustration, a bank with $100,000 capital. Suppose a man in St. Louis has the money with which to establish such a bank; he goes to New York and purchases $100,000 of United States stocks, which are worth 110. He must therefore pay $110,000 in currency, legal-tender notes or bank notes, which he takes from St. Louis, for $100,000 of bonds. He takes those bonds and deposits them with the Treasurer of the United States, and gets in return $90,000 in bank currency, which he takes back to St. Louis. The result is that he has $90,000 to circulate among the people of Missouri, whereas he had $110,000 before. Therefore it is not a question of currency, for he reduces his currency $20,000, but it is a question as to the profits of the bank which he establishes. If the people of the South and West have the currency there now with which to establish these banks, what is the use of establishing the banks? If they have the currency and desire to establish the banks the result is that when they take that currency to New York and convert it into bonds and get their banks going they have less currency than they had before. What is the use, then, of increasing the bank circulation, except for the profits they make in banking?

To assert that the issuing of $20,000,000 more currency is not expansion, seems to me to be folly. This is a direct proposition of expansion, which we have pledged ourselves to the country against. It is against the policy of resumption of specie payments upon the road to which we entered after the war. You have now seven dollars of currency in circulation to one dollar of gold. Add this $20,000,000, and you make it $7 20 to one dollar, and you are just that much further from specie payments, and I do not see how we are to reach resumption by increasing the volume of currency and increasing the price of everything. The office-holders, the clerks in your Departments, are coming here because the price of everything is so high and asking you to increase their salaries twenty per cent. You hesitate to do that, and now you propose to issue a currency that will make it cost them more to live than it does at present. You have already doubled the price of every article they use here for the sustenance of life; you hesitate about increasing their salaries twenty per cent.; and now you propose to increase the currency $20,000,000, which will add two and a half per cent. to the value of gold, and the result will be that the price of everything will advance. The necessaries of life will advance in price; these persons will be compelled to pay more and they will have to come to you and ask for a still further increase of salary. The question is whether we shall keep on increasing this circulation, advancing prices, adding to salaries, to the pay of Senators and all employes of the Government, or whether we shall stand still and work up gradually to a position where we can see a prospect of resumption.

I do not desire to contract the currency at present, but I implore Senators to look well to this, and at least let us stand where we are. If the West have money to invest in banking capital, they do not need this provision, for they have more currency than they will have after they establish these banks. It is a mere question of dollars and cents as to the profits. Why increase the currency for the purpose of giving profits to people in the West? It would seem that the people of the East have more money in New York to-day than they want and are only getting three or four per cent. for it. If the people of the West desire money, it will flow there for speculation in flour and products of every kind; but I say they have more currency now than they can use. I hope this bill will be laid on the table; it seems to me that it is only a proposition to increase the circulation, and to place ourselves in a worse position, further off from specie payments than we were before.

Mr. POMEROY. If we could ever get to a vote on this question it would be gratifying to me. I voted with the Senator from Ohio two or three days ago to take up this bill because he assured me that we could complete it that day.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not my fault that we did not do so. I have sat here perfectly quiet all day to-day and have not heard the pending amendment discussed more than fifteen minutes during all this livelong day. Now, I hope the Senate will stand by me until this bill is defeated or passed or put out of the way in some mode.

Mr. POMEROY. I have made up my mind never to vote to take up another bill in regard to banks. It is an endless theme. Whenever we begin a discussion about banks there is no end to it. My excellent friend from Oregon [Mr. CORBETT] has shown that it is a grand system of retrenchment. The new idea of my friend from Oregon is exceedingly interesting, because he shows that if we now organize new banks under this provision we shall have $20,000 less of currency on every $100,000 than we had before. If this is a system of retrenchment of that kind, I am against it. I was going to vote for it until my friend from Oregon proved that it was such a reduction of currency to issue $20,000,000 more that I am in doubt whether I shall vote for it or not. [Laughter.]

Mr. CORBETT. A reduction to your section of country.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. CONKLING. We had better take the vote on this amendment first.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well; I withdraw the motion for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, I beg to occupy the attention of the Senate for one minute. I want to get the sense of the Senate on the simple proposition whether they will recall $20,000,000 of circulation from the New England States. That is the result of the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky. If the Senators from New England are willing to agree to that, I have no objection, and if the Senate so decide, I am then prepared to conform my action to the judgment of the Senate on that point.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to ask how this circulation can be withdrawn? There is no law to withdraw it.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the question to be solved. Let us have the vote.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 27, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Cameron, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Davis, Doolittle, Ferry, Harlan, Hendricks, Howe, McCreery, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Vickers, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Cragin, Fessenden, Henderson, Howard, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Röss, Sherman, Sprague, Van Winkle, and Williams—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Conness, Dixon, Drake, Edmunds, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Johnson, Norton, Ramsey, Saulsbury, and Willey—12.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move that the bill, with the amendments, be laid upon the table; and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senator from Michigan will withdraw the motion for a moment. I wish to state the position of the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not detain the Senate more than a few moments. This bill contains two clauses which excite some interest. The first section prohibiting the payment of interest on bank balances I consider important, and I desire a vote on it. Then this section as amended prohibits any increase of banking circulation, but provides for a withdrawal of the $20,000,000, the issue of which we propose to authorize by withdrawing it from three or four New England States. I do not think the section as it now stands is so framed that it can be executed promptly, but when I saw what was the sense of the Senate, that this increase should be withdrawn from those States having a surplus, I carefully drew a section which the Senator from Kentucky is satisfied to receive as a substitute for his proposition, which will carry out easily and perfectly what is now the deliberate judgment of the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. Let us hear it read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask that it be read as part of my remarks; but perhaps I had better read it myself, as it is my own handwriting. It is to strike out the whole of the fifth section as it stands and to insert:

That to secure a better distribution of the national banking currency there may be issued circulating notes to banking associations organized in the States and Territories having less national banking circulation than five dollars per inhabitant; but the amount of such circulation shall not exceed $20,000,000; and the circulation herein authorized shall within one year be withdrawn pro rata from banks organized in States and Territories having a circulation exceeding that provided by the act approved March 3, 1863, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof,'" to ascertain which the Comptroller of the Currency shall make a statement showing the amount of circulation to be returned by each of such banks, and shall make a requisition for such amount upon such bank; and upon failure of such bank to return the amount so required within the year aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency to sell at public auction in New York an amount of bonds deposited by said bank as security for their circulation equal to the circulation to be withdrawn from such bank, and with the proceeds to redeem so much of the notes of such bank as may come into the Treasury as will equal the amount required from them.

I was glad to see a disposition on the part of the Senators representing States that have an excess of circulation to allow a withdrawal of a small percentage of their circulation in order to supply the States that have so little. Some Senators may not understand the pressure of public feeling in some of the States on this subject; but I assure the Senate now that for us to adjourn without making some provision to equalize the banking circulation of the country, especially in States that have none, will be a cause of widespread and general dissatisfaction. I know there is a feeling in the Senate against the increase of paper money, and I reciprocate that, and I am glad to see that Senators from New England States, most of whom would be affected by this provision, are willing to surrender a small portion of their excess of circulation to comply with this demand for $20,000,000.

If this amendment is adopted it will provide a way by which within a year the States having no banking circulation now will have a local circulation of their own, and it will be withdrawn from the others by slow and gradual process, so as not to disturb the business of the country. I am rather glad, on the whole, that the Senate have come to this conclusion. The Committee on Finance did not feel safe in reporting to the Senate a proposition to take from banks already legally organized a portion of their local circulation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask the Senator whether his amendment as drawn provides for taking first from those States which are most largely in excess. There are some States that are very largely in excess of what they are entitled to, and others that have only a single excess.

Mr. SHERMAN. The law now requires that one half of the total circulation of the national banks, $150,000,000, shall be distributed according to population, and the other half according to business, resources, &c., somewhat upon the idea advanced by the Senator from West Virginia. The first duty of the Comptroller of the Currency under this section will be to make this distribution.

According to the law referred to in the section, one half will be divided according to population, and the other half according to business, resources, &c., which will be ascertained, no doubt, from the census or from other authority. The result will be, I think, that New York, which has enormous commercial and other resources, will be found not to have more than its proportion, or very little more. The only States, so far as I know, that will be affected by it, will be Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, possibly Maryland, and perhaps Vermont; but I cannot say certainly until the apportionment is made. I do not think more than six or seven States will be required to furnish the excess. Maine has twelve dollars of circulation per inhabitant. It has more than its proportion if the whole $300,000,000 were based on population; but when it is based on resources in part, Maine probably would be entitled to a fraction above what she would have if the whole were distributed upon population alone.

At any rate, this would carry into execution to the extent of $20,000,000 the meaning and intent and purpose of the law requiring a distribution of bank circulation. If the Senate is willing to take this the Senator from Kentucky authorizes me to offer it as a substitute. I take it as the judgment of the Senate; this, I believe, will be effective. I would be very glad to have the bill passed in this way, although I would have preferred to issue the $20,000,000 without disturbing any bank organization in the States.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio a question. He anticipates, I suppose, a motion to lay this bill on the table. I desire, before I am required to vote on that motion, to understand whether he intends to persist in the passage of the first section of this bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no authority, representing the Committee on Finance, to waive any section of the bill; but I do not want to debate the first section, and coming with them to have a vote at once on it. If a majority of the Senate are for it, I want it in the bill. The first section, in my judgment, is exceedingly important for the safety of the system; but I want the Senate to pass upon it. I do not intend to debate that section.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Some time ago a question was taken upon considering this bill after a debate upon that first section, and the Senator from Ohio stated that he would regard that as a test vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. On that section?

Mr. BUCKALEW. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. But I will say to the Senator that several Senators who voted to lay the bill over on that occasion came and told me that they voted to postpone it not with a desire to defeat the bill, but to satisfy the wish of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] who wanted further time to look into it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. It was understood that would dispose of the bill, at least so far as the important question involved in the first section was concerned. I, among others, agreed afterward informally to take up this bill and have it considered; and the object was that the other parts of the bill might be passed; it was said that the other sections were important, were necessary to perfect the banking system; but I had no idea when participating in the movement to get this bill up again that we were to have the first section pressed for adoption. If the Senator does not inform us that he is willing to waive that first section, I shall vote with the Senator from Michigan to lay the bill on the table; if not, I will vote against him.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is perfectly evident that the discussion of this bill is hardly commenced yet. The first section will lead to a longer discussion than has yet occurred upon the bill; and the result of that discussion, in my judgment, will be to strike out that section. But this last section, which is the only portion of the bill that commends itself to my mind, is a fallacy even under the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky. It amounts to nothing. It is not a tub to the whale; it is not a herring to a school of sharks. It is mere ballast. I therefore, to avoid three or four days' discussion on this bill, which certainly must follow, renew my motion to lay the whole subject on the table; it is, in my judgment, utterly useless to go on with it; and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays being taken resulted—yeas 21, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, DeCottle, Ferry, Harlan, Hendricks, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Sprague, Stewart, Trumbull, Vickers, Williams, and Yates—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Cole, Cragin, Davis, Fessenden, Henderson, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ross, Sherman, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, and Wilson—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Dixon, Drake, Edmunds, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Howard, Johnson, Norton, Ramsey, and Saulsbury—11.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the committee as amended—the fifth section.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will now offer my amendment, or I can do it in the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON. I move to strike out the first section; and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CHANDLER. I stated yesterday that when that first section came up I was prepared to discuss it. That first section, as I stated, is perfectly atrocious. It proposes to prohibit any national bank in the three large cities, where all the national banks throughout the United States are compelled to keep their balances, from paying interest on those balances, even although they may desire thus to pay interest. Now, sir, there is not a national bank, I presume, in the whole United States that is not compelled to keep a deposit in some one of these three large cities, and generally they are compelled to keep a large deposit there. Take country banks with $100,000 capital; and nine out of ten of them, as is shown by the statement which I have on my desk, have a deposit of one hundred thousand dollars or upward. The redemptions are all made by drafts upon the city of New York or upon the city of Boston or the city of Philadelphia. I asked the cashier of the largest bank in the city of Detroit, a few days before I left home, what amount of redemptions had been called for in the four years the bank had been in existence; and he told me that one single ten-dollar bill was every redemption he had made in the four years.

He had not been called upon except for that one ten-dollar bill. All the banks must redeem by drafts upon New York or upon these large States. Your law compels them to redeem there. The demand for redemption is upon those cities. The banks require even in specie-paying times $1,000 in drafts on New York where they redeem one single dollar of their notes in coin. The ratio is not too highly stated when I say that they require $1,000 in drafts on New York when they are paying coin, to one dollar redemption at their counter.

Then again, sir, throughout the Northwest the entire business of our banks almost is by exchange on eastern cities. A man goes out to buy a thousand head of cattle, a million bushels of wheat, a million feet of lumber, a thousand tons of copper, or whatever else he goes out to buy; he goes prepared to draw upon the great cities; he will draw perhaps at thirty or sixty days; those drafts are there discounted, and funds naturally accumulate there. A bank with a capital of $1,000,000 in the West will nine times out of ten have a million or more on deposit. Here is their $1,000,000 of circulation, and here is their $1,000,000 of deposits, all liable to be called upon at a moment's notice; all must be redeemed, if called upon, by drafts on New York; they are compelled to keep large balances there. A bank without $1,000,000 of deposits and $1,000,000 of circulation is compelled, in order to be in a safe condition, to keep at least $500,000 constantly on an average on deposit in the eastern cities.

The banks in those cities are anxious to pay four per cent. interest upon this reserve fund. It amounts to an enormous sum. I have on my desk a statement that the average amount the year around is over seventy-three million dollars. They are anxious to pay four per cent., and why? Because the average amount for which they loan these reserve funds is six per cent. and upward. They make not only the four per cent. they pay, but they make fifty per cent. additional upon the four per cent. they pay; the average is over six per cent. and has been for the last six years, and will be for the six years to come.

As I stated a short time ago, the proposition itself is atrocious, because here are the heaviest banks in the United States, and the most reliable, standing ready to pay four per cent. and anxious to do it; but you say that if banks who are forced to make these deposits receive that four per cent. on them they shall immediately go into bankruptcy. Mr. President, this first section is and should be designated a proposition to swindle the whole people of the United States for the benefit of a few banks and bankers in the three great cities of the United States.

Mr. President, if this section is to pass, I propose to offer an amendment, and I will read it now, but I will not offer it. I do not propose that these rich banks and bankers, these few individuals in the three great cities, shall enrich themselves at the expense of the entire people of the United States. These little banks, these seventeen hundred banks scattered all over the United States are in the habit of paying the four per cent. which they receive in New York for trust funds and court funds and other funds that lie there permanently. Strike off the possibility of their receiving that four per cent. and they will refuse to pay the four per cent.; therefore you are robbing not the banks, but the trust funds and the widows' and orphans' funds all over the nation. If this section is not stricken out, I shall, after the vote is taken, offer an amendment which I will read now, but do not yet offer. It is made by this first section the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency to see that this act is observed, and I propose to put in after "observed" the following proviso:

Provided, That it shall be unlawful for any national bank or banking association in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, or Boston, receiving deposits from national banks as provided in this section, to loan any portion of their deposits; and it is to be made the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency to see that this proviso is enforced; and upon violation thereof by any national bank or banking association he is to be authorized and required to proceed, as in other cases of default, to appoint a receiver and wind up the affairs of such association, according to the provisions of section fifty of said act.

If you prohibit them from paying interest, prohibit them from receiving interest. The banks in these great cities are very differently situated from the country banks anywhere throughout the United States. If a bank in New York or in Boston has to-day $100,000 or $500,000 over, that it thinks it will not require for four or five days or for thirty days, its cashier steps out and says, "I will loan this surplus for thirty days or five days or one day for five or six per cent.," and he will take his interest for one day or thirty days or sixty days; but it is not so with the banks throughout the country. They are compelled to take their regular business paper in the regular way, and rely on the receipts from that paper for their interest account; but in New York, as everybody well knows, the banks loan to the last dollar this surplus fund, this seventy odd millions that continually lie there as a permanent fund almost. They can tell within $1,000,000 any day the amount that will be there, and it amounts, I say, to a permanent fund.

The banking institutions of those great cities are ready and anxious to pay four per cent. under competition; but the getters up of this bill—I do not believe it was got up in the Committee on Finance, I do not believe they would do so unjust a thing; I believe it was gotten up by a committee from these banks—not satisfied with receiving two per cent. or three per cent. excess over the four, want the whole. Instead of making their $1,500,000, which that per cent. would give them on the seventy odd millions, they want to make six or seven per cent. out of it, and defraud the entire people of the United States to do it. A beautiful thing it would be if carried!

If the Senate shall refuse to strike out this first section, which is in all its phases atrocious, then I shall offer and hope to carry this proviso compelling them that pay no interest to receive no interest, compelling them to hold their reserve deposits on hand and not loan them. What is good for the country banks is good for them. Let them receive nothing upon their deposits and pay nothing, and then they will always be ready to meet their liabilities. I hope the first section will be stricken out.

Mr. CATTELL. Mr. President, I am very sorry, indeed, to detain the Senate, already exhausted by a very extensive discussion upon this bill; and having heretofore, when the subject was before the Senate three months ago, explained my views in regard to the first section of this bill, I regret being compelled again to trespass on the indulgence of the Senate. But the malicious attack of my friend from Michigan upon this first section, denominating it atrocious, which I believe the dictionary says is the sum of all wickedness, and denouncing it as a swindle upon the people of the United States, as I am willing to acknowledge the paternity of the section myself, it seems to me incumbent that I should say a few words in reply to the assault.

Mr. SPRAGUE. If the Senator will give way, I will submit a motion to adjourn, and he can be heard to-morrow on this question. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust not. We shall have a vote in a few minutes. ["No." "No."] The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken resulted—yeas 16, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Corbett, Cragin, Doolittle, Hendricks, Howe, McGreevy, Patterson of Tennessee, Sprague, Vickers, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Cole, Connors, Davis, Harlan, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of New Hampshire, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Conkling, Dixon, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Howard, Johnson, Morton, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, and Sausbury—20.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. CATTELL. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a few minutes on a simple explanation of the principles, as I understand them, involved in the first section of the bill which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] now moves to strike out.

When this bill was under consideration some two months ago I advocated at some length the principle contained in this section; and I should not now trouble the Senate further on the subject but for the malicious attack made upon this section of the bill by the Senator from Michigan, who has seen fit to speak of it as "atrocious," and to call it a swindle. The simple purpose of the section is to prohibit the payment of interest, by national banks, on the deposits or balances of other national banks, and thus prevent the indirect use of the reserve required to be held by all national banks.

The national currency act provides for the maintaining in all the national banks of a given reserve of lawful money, a sum considered by those who originated the system and by all who are familiar with the principles of banking as essential to the safety and security of all banking operations. Every intelligent merchant and every intelligent banker knows that there must always be held, behind either his commercial business or his banking operations a reserve upon which to fall back under extraordinary circumstances and upon extraordinary occasions. Before the establishment of the national banking system in all the commercial cities the clearing-house arrangement established a rule among themselves requiring each of the banks connected with the association to maintain a given amount of reserve in lawful money. During the period of specie payments that reserve was, of course, held in coin, and always in lawful money. So particular were these associations in regard to this subject, and so important did they deem it, that they agreed among themselves that reports made weekly under oath by the officers of each bank should be submitted to the association in order to ascertain whether this agreement was complied with.

In the establishment of the national banking system this principle of maintaining a reserve, which is the conservative power of the moneyed interest of the country; just that which prevents a bank from working up to its maximum and putting to use its last dollar; just that which is the safety and security of the immense business operations of the country, was wisely provided for. A skillful and prudent engineer would not carry a pressure upon a steam boiler up to its maximum capacity. If he should do so, the slightest accident or derangement of the machinery would result in disaster. And your laws wisely limits the pressure which shall be put upon steam machinery far below what has been found by actual test to be its maximum capacity.

It is upon that principle, upon the principle that it is unsafe to work up the whole of the capital of the country, especially of a country with a large amount of paper currency, that this lawful reserve is required to be kept by the banks of the country. And it is this reserve that constitutes, in my judgment, the balance-wheel of our financial system.

In the fixing of this lawful reserve, it was provided that in the large cities, in the localities where the demand was likely to come in larger amounts, and where sudden emergencies are always soonest felt, a reserve of twenty-five per cent. upon the entire indebtedness of the banks should be always maintained; and in order that the currency of the national banking system should be uniform in its character, in order that it should make a circulating medium of equal value all over the country, it was provided in the organization of the system that the banks in the interior should redeem their currency at certain commercial centers, and nineteen cities of the Union were named as points at some one of which the banks organized in the interior should maintain a deposit for the redemption of their circulation. In view of the fact that these banks were compelled to redeem at these commercial centers, the national banking act provided that they should only be required to maintain in all a reserve of fifteen per cent. of their indebtedness, making at once a difference of ten per cent. between the reserve which was required of the banks in the large commercial cities and the reserve required of the interior banks—a discrimination in favor of the latter.

And more than that; the law not only discriminated in favor of the country banks for this reason, by providing that only fifteen per cent. should be required of them as a reserve, but in view of the fact that, for the sake of establishing a uniform currency, it had been provided that these banks should establish redemption points in one of these cities, the law went a step further, and provided that out of the fifteen per cent. of reserve, out of this lower percentage which was granted for this reason to the country banks, they should be permitted to hold on deposit in any of the redemption cities, in any one of the nineteen named, not any one of the three great cities of which the Senator talks so loudly to-day, but in any one of the cities named in the bill, in the gentleman's own city, the city of Detroit, which is one of the redemption centers; that these banks should be permitted to keep three fifths of this reserve there and count it precisely the same as if it was lawful money in the vaults of the bank.

Now, take a bank of $100,000 capital in the interior, and suppose it has $100,000 of circulation and $300,000 of deposits, it has an aggregate indebtedness of $400,000. The reserve required by the banking act of that country bank is $60,000, while a bank similarly situated in one of the cities would be required to keep a reserve of $100,000. It is said that it is a hardship that these banks should be compelled to redeem their money at the commercial centers in the redemption cities. Then your law turns around and provides that while this bank shall only be required to keep $60,000 as the entire amount of its reserve, it may take three fifths of that amount, say $36,000, and place it on deposit in any bank in one of the nineteen cities, and be permitted to count it as a part of the reserve precisely the same as if it was within its own vaults, where, but for this provision, it must have been kept.

Mr. President, I do not object to that provision at all. It is a liberal one, liberal in all its aspects to the country banks. It is liberal not to require of them more than fifteen per cent. reserve, when the city banks must keep twenty-five per cent.; and it is liberal, liberal in the extreme, that when these banks, from their business relations, for the purpose of drawing exchange and for the purpose of redeeming their circulating notes, are obliged to keep in the commercial centers some of their funds, the national banking law not only allows them to hold it there for their own convenience, but absolutely permits them to count it as a portion of their reserve, the same as if it was held in lawful money at home.

Now, the question comes whether these banks shall deposit this reserve in the commercial cities under such circumstances as amounts absolutely to a loan of it. They are forbidden to use this money at home. If it were not for this privilege of depositing in the city banks and counting it as reserved, they would be compelled to keep the fifteen per cent. in their vaults, and it would be a violation of the law if they were to loan one dollar of the fifteen per cent. which is required for a reserve. You insist, all honest, competent, faithful financiers insist that that reserve is necessary, and that you have placed the reserve as low as is safe to the country banks at fifteen per cent.; and yet you say that these banks may indirectly violate this law, that while you forbid them to loan this money to their own people in their own neighborhoods, for whose accommodation the bank was established, you yet admit that they may take three fifths of the reserve which you require, and virtually loan it under the name of a deposit to one of the banks in the redemption cities at four per cent., or such other rate of interest as may be agreed upon, thus virtually destroying all the conservative power of the reserve contemplated in your bank act.

And that is not all. It is not only the fact that the reserve is thus brought into use, but the temptation is so strong for the country banks to withdraw their assets from the country and place them in the commercial centers, where beside obtaining interest upon their balances they can draw exchange upon them at large profits, day after day, by a charge of one fourth or one half per cent. or more on their exchange, that they keep in the cities a much larger sum even than the three fifths of their required reserve. The worst feature of the whole thing is, that instead of keeping only the three fifths of the reserve, which would be something like forty million dollars, you find in the redemption cities seventy odd million dollars of the funds of the interior banks. More than one third of all the banking capital outside of the redemption cities is gathered up and sent to the commercial centers, there to foster speculation, to be loaned out on call by the day, or even by the hour, as my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] suggested the other day, while the people in the interior, in the West and Southwest, are clamoring for circulation and demanding an increase of banking facilities.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to put the same question to the Senator from New Jersey that I put to the Senator from Ohio. If the country banks send three fifths of their money to the cities, and loan it to the city banks at four per cent. per annum, of course the city banks use it or they would not pay interest on it. If you stop that, is it not contraction? It may be a bad practice that you propose to stop, but will not the stopping of it be practically contraction to that extent?

Mr. CATTELL. In my judgment the practice has no influence on expansion or contraction so far as the excess above the reserve of which I have just been speaking is concerned. It only takes the money out of its legitimate channels, attracts it from where it legitimately belongs to localities where it is not needed. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] suggests that if the reserve is used, as it is indirectly by the city banks loaning it, it produces expansion, which is undoubtedly true.

The whole truth of the matter, Mr. President, is that the system of paying interest upon bank balances is a mistake from the beginning. Banks are constituted to be lenders and not borrowers of money; and whenever they become borrowers and bidders for money they fail to serve the purposes for which they were established, and become institutions injurious to the community. The object of a bank is to cheapen the rate of interest. Banks are established for the purpose of accommodating the community and of equalizing and cheapening the rate of interest. How is this accomplished when a bank goes out into the market as a borrower of money, borrowing it at one rate and relending it to somebody else at a higher rate? Is it the legitimate business of a bank to borrow money under any circumstances? I insist on it that banks are established to lend money, not to borrow it; and the whole system of the payment of interest on bank balances is illegitimate banking, and it has been so held by all the eminent bankers, both of this and the old country, for the last half century.

The Bank of England, as a matter of principle, has always held that it was illegitimate banking to pay interest on bank balances; and I believe the history of our own country will show that the banking institutions the most stable, those which have the greatest confidence of the communities where they are located, have resisted the pernicious practice of paying interest on bank balances. I am sure this is so in the city of Philadelphia, and I believe the oldest and strongest banks in the city of New York are of this class. The Bank of Commerce, wielding a capital of $10,000,000, to this day, I understand, refuses under any and every circumstance the payment of interest on bank balances as a matter of principle, and, in my judgment, they act wisely.

Most assuredly if there be any propriety in establishing by law a reserve of lawful money to be kept by the banks, it is a grave mistake to permit it to be used indirectly when you refuse to have it used directly.

The Senator from Michigan speaks about a bank in the interior with $100,000 capital having over one hundred thousand dollars on deposit in the city of New York.

Mr. CHANDLER. Fifty thousand dollars. Mr. CATTELL. The Senator said $100,000, but I am willing he shall say $50,000, if he prefers. We have been discussing here for days the propriety of authorizing banking institutions to supply the wants of the West and of the Southwest. Let me ask of what use a banking institution in that section would be if it sent its entire capital of $100,000 to New York and placed it upon deposit there? Will anybody tell me what advantage there is in the establishment of a bank in a particular locality, which is, of course, intended for the benefit of the business, the commerce, manufactures, and agriculture of that neighborhood, if you take the whole amount of its capital and send it to New York or to Philadelphia or to Boston, or even to Detroit, where it may just as well be sent, for it will be remembered there are nineteen of these redemption cities, and that Detroit is one of them.

The Senator from Michigan has seen proper to talk about this first section being for the benefit of the three great cities. I beg to say that this is an entire misapprehension against the interests of every one of the three great cities. The gentlemen in New York would not seek to get this amount of money for their institutions and agree to pay a certain rate of interest for it if they did not think there was a gain from it; and it is quite clear if interest is not allowed on these bank balances, the amount kept in New York will be materially reduced. It is against the interest of the city of Philadelphia, in which I am somewhat concerned. Why? Take as a simple matter of illustration, if you please, the little bank over which I have the honor to preside. According to our business now, we must maintain a reserve of about half a million of dollars. According to the provisions of the law as it now stands, we can send $300,000 over to the city of New York, loan it at four per cent. per annum, and get $12,000 upon it. I need not tell this body that, being anxious as everybody else to make money in all lawful ways, we have done this to some extent, because it is allowed by the law; but I insist upon it that it is a bad practice; I insist upon it that it is unwise thus to destroy the conservative power of the reserve, and indirectly defeat the provisions of the law in this particular. If fifteen per cent. is too much reserve to require of the interior banks, we ought to reduce the amount; we ought not to require them to carry more than they should carry, and then permit them indirectly to defend the object of the law by virtually putting into use what should be held unused as the reserve.

Beside, this practice is one of the disturbing elements in our finance. When this money from the interior is sent into our great commercial centers it is sent at times when money is easy, when it is plethoric in the country. It comes to New York and meets precisely the same condition of things there; money is abundant. What is the result? The amount of the bank reserve accumulates very largely, and the bank cashier runs out into the street to find somebody to loan it to at a low rate of interest on call. The result is to stimulate stock speculation. Erie and Harlem go up one, two, three dollars a share, because all the money from the interior is swept into the great commercial centers. What is the next result? By and by the crops are to be moved, and there comes a demand from the country for money; and the first thing you know is that money very suddenly is getting tight in New York; money is worth one per cent. more this week than it was last; the banks are beginning to draw in their call loans; and what is the result? The result is that stocks go down again; there is one, two, three, or five dollars a share decline upon Erie and upon Harlem. The consequence is that the men who watch this sort of thing, your stock speculators and gamblers in Wall street, are enabled to make money while the legitimate business of the country is absolutely disturbed by this state of things.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will my friend allow me to fortify his argument in this particular by telling him of a historical case that occurred not very long ago? The great commotion of 1857 was caused by just this practice. Nearly all the western banks had deposited their funds in New York with the Ohio Life and Trust Company at four or five per cent. Our Ohio people were terribly bitten. All at once the concern was found to be in a failing condition. The country banks commenced drawing on the Ohio Life and Trust Company. The company threw its collaterals on the market, which led to the depreciation, and the whole thing exploded. That was caused by the country banks depositing the balances with that company in order to get interest.

Mr. CAMERON. Allow me to say a word about that. I beg leave to contradict the chairman of the Committee on Finance, the Senator from Ohio, in the fact he has mentioned. The Ohio Life and Trust Company and the banks of Ohio did not loan, but borrowed money. It was the borrowing of that great Ohio corporation which broke up the banks of the country at that day, and the Senator from Ohio ought to know that historical fact at least.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am perfectly sure that the fact is as I have stated.

Mr. CAMERON. I remember the history of that day. I remember that a speculative corporation called the Ohio Life and Trust Company borrowed money everywhere where ever it could get it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Untold millions almost.

Mr. CAMERON. Yes, untold millions. It threw its securities into the city of New York and the New York banks, and New York capitalists took its securities until it broke up the whole of them. That is the history of that day.

Mr. SHERMAN. I said that the State banks had put their funds with the Ohio Life and Trust Company, and that the company loaned out the money, and that was the cause of the difficulty.

Mr. CATTELL. I shall be very happy to have these gentlemen settle their differences at some other time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will not the Senator yield to a motion to adjourn? It is plain that we cannot finish this bill to-night.

Mr. CATTELL. I shall not detain the Senate much longer. In regard to the question which has been raised between the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Pennsylvania, I have only to say that the circumstances connected with that case are familiar to everybody who was engaged in commercial affairs at the time. The fact is, that the Ohio Life and Trust Company established its principal branch in the city of New York, and there it learned New York habits, it learned to bid for the country bank balances and to pay interest on them. It had in its office in New York, which was its main office, although it was called the Ohio Life and Trust Company, immense sums of money borrowed from corporations and individuals for which it was paying interest. It was suddenly called upon in 1857 to pay some of its debts due on demand; the collapse came, and it tumbled down. I think that is really the state of the case in regard to that institution.

The Senator from Michigan very kindly in the course of his remarks exonerated the Finance Committee from the wickedness and atrocity of having originated this measure; and I believe he honestly thinks to-day that the committee themselves would not have committed so great a swindle upon the country as the introduction of the first section of this bill. I believe he has great faith in their integrity, but not so much, I apprehend, in their discernment. Now, I beg to say that the subject has been brought to the attention of Congress more than once by the Comptroller of the Currency and the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CAMERON. Who has confidence in the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. CATTELL. The Senator asks me a question which I leave the Secretary's friends to answer. There are some of them here, I believe. The Comptroller of the Currency in his last report, which I think one of the ablest documents sent to Congress during the present session, argues it at length, and I beg leave upon this question to close my remarks by reading the argument which the Comptroller of the Currency made in regard to it. It convinced me and I think it ought to satisfy the Senate. For years it has been my custom to think and to talk upon this subject and to discuss it with eminent bankers in Philadelphia, New York, and elsewhere; and I have to say that I do not know in the whole circle of my acquaintance a banker of skill, a man cultivated on the subject of finance, who does not agree that the payment of interest by banks on bank or individual balances is an error and is illegitimate banking. If this reform does not come at this Congress it will come at some time. If it does not come through the action of Congress preventing the national banks, over which it has control, from paying interest on balances it will come when the evils of the system come to be developed, and when bank officers themselves will be compelled in self-defense to adopt it as a principle.

I will now read what the Comptroller of the Currency says on this subject, and I beg the Senator from Michigan to observe that probably the gentleman guilty of the atrocity, to which he has alluded, may be Mr. Hulburd or some other of the gentlemen who have been connected with our financial department for the last two or three years, and therefore the committee are somewhat sustained by their opinions on the subject. Mr. Hulburd says in his report:

"Attention is respectfully called to a practice prevailing, more or less, in the banks of the principal cities, of paying interest on the balances of country banks—a practice characterized by the Chancellor of the Exchequer of England in commenting upon the causes which led to the crisis of 1857, as one eminently liable to abuse, and containing within it elements of danger, and to which many of the evils of the recent crisis may be attributed.

"Country banks keep deposits with city banks for the purpose of facilitating exchanges in carrying on their own business."

They do not do it to oblige the city banks, but to facilitate their own business—

"and ordinarily, it is to be presumed, they find a profit in doing such business, and in keeping a working balance in the city banks. The funds so placed are needed, and properly belong there, but will not be allowed to exceed the amount actually necessary for the current demands of business. The payment of high rates of interest on such balances attracts all the spare capital from the country to the commercial centers, while it is still payable on call. This capital would not remain dead or unemployed, but it is drawn away from the country where it is needed, to the business centers where the rate of interest is higher. The cities then come into competition with the country, and compel borrowers in the country to pay higher rates."

M. Pereire, president of the Credit Mobilier, of France, says that "banks have been instituted only to lower the rate of interest, and they fail in their mission when they do not fulfill that character." But this is one of the minor evils of the practice.

"The city banks, by the payment of interest, offer a premium for deposits, the volume of which should be regulated only by the ebb and flow of trade. An artificial stimulant is applied in order to accumulate funds in excess of the natural demand. So long as the country banks can employ their means more profitably at home they will do so; but when their own trade is dull, they will send their money to the business centers; and it so happens that the city banks will secure the greatest abundance of means exactly at the time when they have the least use for them. But as they pay interest for such deposits, they must be used; the city banker becomes a broker, a seeker after investments; he must get more interest than he pays or he will lose money; he must loan it on call, for it is payable on demand, and it will always be demanded when he wants it most. Deposits are the reserve of the country, and the deposits of the country banks at the centers of trade are their reserves for all demands and liabilities. Required by law to keep a reserve equal to fifteen per cent. of their deposits and circulation, three fifths of this reserve may consist of balances due from city banks. Forbidden to use their reserve in their own business they remit it to New York, where it is not held in reserve, but is loaned to stock-brokers and speculators. Receiving interest on the amount under the name of a deposit, they really loan it on call to the city banks, which in their turn loan it at a higher rate of interest."

I submit, Mr. President, that the principle contained in the first section of this bill is a correct one, and that if nothing further is done by this Congress on the subject of finance, it is imperatively demanded, for the safety of the national banking system, for the credit and the honor of the law upon our statute-book requiring a specified reserve, that you shall not permit the national banks to do indirectly what you refuse to permit them to do directly; that you shall not make it unlawful for the interior bank to loan any part of the fifteen per cent. reserve to the people in the neighborhood in which the bank is located who may need bank accommodations for legitimate business, and yet permit such bank to send three fifths of its reserve to one of the redemption cities and virtually make a loan of it there, counting it all the time as their reserve, the same as they would unused lawful money in their own vaults.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President—

Mr. BUCKALEW. I hope my colleague will allow me to ask a question. I do not know much about banking, and I desire some information, some instruction. I do not understand why a country bank, where the rate of interest is six per cent., should refuse to accommodate its neighbors at that rate, and send its funds to the city banks and deposit them there and get four per cent. on them. I find a statement of that sort—it seems to me incomprehensible—made in the paper read from the Comptroller of the Currency, and also insisted upon by the Senator from New Jersey.

There is another point upon which I wish enlightenment. If we pass this bill and forbid the city bank from paying any interest upon the money of the country bank which it holds, I desire to know whether the city bank will actually use that fund and make profit on it as before?

Mr. CATTELL. I shall be glad to answer both of the gentleman's questions. In the first place the country banks cannot loan this money, which is required to be held as a reserve of fifteen per cent. at home at all at any rate of interest. That is the answer to that question.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Then it must be because there is no demand of business at home for it.

Mr. CATTELL. No; it is because they cannot do it; by law they are compelled to reserve fifteen per cent. in their vaults, and of that three fifths they are allowed to send to New York and count as their reserve. If it were not so sent they would have been obliged to keep it in lawful money in their vaults.

Mr. BUCKALEW. My question was generally in regard to this transfer of funds. Moneys over and above this reserve are sent to the cities.

Mr. CATTELL. Certainly. I will answer that question as well as I can. In the first place, that reserve amounts to about forty million dollars. That is a good deal of money to start with. But there is something like seventy million dollars kept in the cities, and the reason for that I apprehend is to be found in the fact that the amount of money in a country bank is often larger than they are willing to loan upon time paper; larger than they are willing to lend to A, B, or C for sixty or ninety days or four months, the earliest time they can get it back; but it is a sum which they can send off to a city, and they can there get four per cent. on the amount, subject to call whenever they shall want it; and as they can use a larger amount of their funds in that direction with safety, because it is payable on call, they will deplete their home market of money which is needed there for local purposes.

Mr. CAMERON. It is hardly fair that here at half past five o'clock I should be compelled to reply to my colleague upon this interesting question.

Mr. CATTELL. Your colleague!

Mr. CAMERON. I say my colleague, because although he is elected from New Jersey he lives in Philadelphia. [Laughter.] If the gentleman's legal colleague [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] were here he would take directly the opposite course on this bill. I regret that he is not here because he lives in New Jersey and my friend and colleague lives in Philadelphia. There are—

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator yield to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. CAMERON. Certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is very evident that we cannot conclude this discussion to-night.

This is upon a very important question, and the discussion has but recently come down to the real question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] has the floor.

Mr. CAMERON. I yield to the motion to adjourn.

Mr. CATTELL. I beg the courtesy of the Senator from Indiana to make one correction. The Senator from Pennsylvania does not desire to do me injustice—

Mr. CAMERON. Oh, no; I want to do you honor.

Mr. CATTELL. If there were no New Jersey, I should be glad to live in Philadelphia; but there being such a State as New Jersey, and my residence being there, I claim that gentlemen shall not misrepresent me by saying that I live in Philadelphia. Besides, Mr. President, I discovered when I was a little disposed to take some hand in the appointments in Philadelphia that my friend, the Senator from Pennsylvania, gave me to understand that I resided in New Jersey and represented New Jersey. [Laughter.] I do not want this thing to apply one way one day and another way the next.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to say that I intended to do honor to the Senator who represents New Jersey, because I think it is a great honor to her that her representative should live in the city of Philadelphia. Now, he talks about my having objected to his interfering in the appointments in Philadelphia. I did object; but I was new in the Senate then, and the Senate listened to him, and he put upon me and upon the people of my State several very bad men because he did represent the city of Philadelphia in place of representing New Jersey.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Now does the Senator yield to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. CAMERON. Certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays. I want to pass this bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 19, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Conkling, Corbett, Cragin, Harlan, Hendricks, Howe, McCroery, Patterson of New Hampshire, Sprague, Stewart, Vickers, Wade, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Cole, Davis, Henderson, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Ross, Sherman, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Williams—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Morton, Norton, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Saulsbury, and Sumner—22.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 16, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RECIPROCITY TREATY.

Mr. COVODE, by unanimous consent, presented a remonstrance against the renewal of that part of the reciprocity treaty which would reduce the duty on bituminous coal for the benefit of Nova Scotia interests, signed by representatives of sixteen collieries in Pennsylvania; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

EXTRA PAY OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask consent of the House that a request be sent to the Senate for the return of the House joint resolution No. 291, giving additional pay to certain employés in the civil service of the Government at Washington, in order that action may be taken here upon the motion I entered yesterday to reconsider the vote by which that joint resolution passed this House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I object.

RODERICK R. BUTLER.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege, and call up the amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House No. 870, to remove political disabilities from Roderick R. Butler, of Tennessee.

The question was upon concurring in the amendment of the Senate, to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause, and also to strike out the preamble, and in lieu of the portion stricken out to insert after the enacting clause of the bill the following words:

That all legal and political disabilities imposed by the United States upon Roderick R. Butler, of Tennessee, in consequence of participation in the recent rebellion, be, and the same are hereby, removed. And the said Butler, on entering upon the discharge of the duties of any office to which he has been or may be elected or appointed, instead of the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862, shall take and subscribe the following oath: I, Roderick R. Butler, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion, and that I will faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter, so help me God.

Mr. MULLINS. I wish to know the position in which this now stands, and the character of the amendment now under consideration.

Mr. DAWES. I will explain this amendment in a few words. It does not differ, except in form, from the bills sent to the Senate from this House. The House, as it will be remembered, passed two bills, one generally providing that when political disabilities were, by act of Congress, removed from any individual, then he shall be required simply to take the oath prescribed in that bill; an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and not the oath prescribed by the present law, requiring him to swear that he has not participated in the rebellion. The House also passed another bill removing political disabilities from Roderick R. Butler. The Senate have amended the bill by incorporating in it the principle of the other bill, leaving the general bill still pending in the Senate. The House passed both these bills by very large majorities, and the Senate have indorsed them by putting both in the same bill by an almost unanimous vote; all but five voting in the affirmative, I believe.

Mr. MULLINS. How many Senators did not vote?

Mr. DAWES. I do not know.

Mr. MULLINS. I understand that there were twenty-six Senators who did not vote at all upon the question.

Mr. PRICE. Does not this bill propose to modify the test-oath so as to permit Mr. Butler to take his seat here without taking the test-oath?

Mr. DAWES. This prescribes just the oath prescribed by the bill which passed this House by a majority of three fourths or more. Of course as to this gentleman it does modify the test-oath; otherwise there would be no occasion for passing it.

Mr. PRICE. Is not this the very action we refused to take in the case of Senator PATTERSON, of Tennessee?

Mr. MULLINS. And of Mr. Brown, of Kentucky?

Mr. DAWES. The same, and has already been fully discussed.

Mr. BAKER. Does this bill dispense with the test-oath?

Mr. DAWES. So far as this gentleman is concerned it dispenses with all that part of the test-oath which calls upon him to swear that he did not render aid and comfort to the enemy in any respect, because in point of fact he was a member of the rebel Legislature of Tennessee. Having been such member of the rebel Legislature, it is necessary for him, as an honest man, coming here as he does, not to take the oath at all and not take his seat here or to have the oath modified.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. If this matter came from the Committee of Elections I was not present in the committee when it was considered, and know nothing about the action of the committee. I rise now simply for the purpose of inquiring of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] whether this proposed action does not relate to a matter which, if the pending constitutional amendment had become a part of the Constitution of the United States, would require a vote of two thirds of each House of Congress?

And I desire to say this in addition, that if that amendment be not now in fact a part of the Constitution of the United States, we deem it to be virtually so. And I should regret, especially at this time, just when we are upon the threshold of entering upon the policy of progress which that constitutional amendment is to inaugurate and make perpetual, I would regret to see a letting down, on the part of the law-making power, in regard to the singularly important matter covered by that constitutional amendment.

Mr. DAWES. I reply to my colleague that he does recognize the very question in the mind of my colleague. It passed the House by a two-thirds majority recognizing the element of that constitutional amendment. It came back from the Senate with a two-thirds majority there, and unless the House concurs in the amendment by a two-thirds majority it will not have the legal effect which we expect it to have. I acquiesce in all that my colleague on the committee says, and it is for that reason I hope this amendment will be concurred in by a two-thirds majority. I will therefore call for a division.

I will say that the whole matter was discussed with reference to its application to the constitutional amendment. It goes upon the broad plan that the constitutional amendment contemplates there will be cases which will meet the judgment of two thirds of both branches that will require the remission of that in part, and that such cases must address themselves to the sound discretion and judgment of two thirds of both branches. The Committee of Elections, when this case was before them, were of the unanimous opinion that of all others was one of these cases. It went to the other branch and a new committee, having no connection with this Committee of Elections, examined the case de novo, and came to the same conclusion in the light of this constitutional amendment; and it passed the Senate with only five dissenting votes.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I hope my colleague will have a call of the yeas and nays, and that he will also favor the House and country with the reasons which operate in exempting this individual.

Mr. DAWES. I suppose a division will answer as well as the yeas and nays.

Mr. MULLINS. Let us have the yeas and nays by all means.

Mr. DAWES. On the question of the reasons which induced the committee to report this resolution, they have been already given when my colleague on the committee, as the House as well as the committee regret, was absent on account of ill-health. When this matter was before the House it was spread upon the record in the Globe at great length. I have no hesitation in rehearsing it before the House, but I apprehend the House, who heard me then, are satisfied with the reasons then given.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I did not know that my colleague had explained it before.

Mr. DAWES. As to my own position in this matter—

Mr. MULLINS. Allow me.

Mr. DAWES. In a moment.

Mr. Speaker, I would not ask the House to vote upon such a proposition unless I had myself a good reason that I was willing to put upon the record and stand by; and I so stated at that time and put the reasons that actuated the committee upon the record, and more than three fourths of the House pronounced them satisfactory. I hope, therefore, there will be no occasion for consuming further time. I will now call for the previous question.

Mr. MULLINS. I thought you were going to give me a few minutes?

Mr. DAWES. I do not want to consume time, although I am willing to discuss the question. I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee simply for a question.

Mr. MULLINS. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will allow me to make a few remarks explanatory of my position. I was not here when it passed before. I will not consume five minutes of your time.

Mr. DAWES. How long do you want?

Mr. MULLINS. Five minutes will do me.

Mr. DAWES. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MULLINS. Mr. Speaker, perhaps the fewest number of men who live in the State of Tennessee feel more solemnly or are under a deeper sense of the importance of the circumstances which surrounded us than I am myself; but at the same time while this is the case, I wish the House to distinctly understand from me that my vote here will be cast upon the side maintaining the fundamental principles which stand as the flaming sword before the gateway of this mighty sheepfold of our Republic, guarding its way, not against men, but guarding the principles that are here encoined and lie environed in this fortification. I ask why we shall break down that rule in regard to the test-oath? Let it be taken by all good men. I do not say this is a bad exception, and as a man I have no more to say in regard to it than I have about the man in the moon. I for one would be willing to forgive all that is human to forgive, but when we surrender that principle to an individual I do not want it to be understood nor recorded in this House that I surrender it and vote to break down the fortification that stands as the Word of God to Israel. I maintain that you should obey it and elevate the principle, putting all upon the high and broad platform.

I have nothing to say as between all parties any more than if I was not a Tennessean. I have no more obligation resting upon me than to record my vote, believing this is a weak point in the fortification. And now, as my five minutes are about up, I only desire to add that I was in hopes this cup might pass by me, but being here, I must clear my conscience before my country and my God.

Mr. STOKES. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee if this amendment of the Senate repeals or modifies the test-oath.

Mr. DAWES. It does not repeal or modify it at all, but it prescribes that this man on taking the oath of office shall not be required to swear that he did not participate in the rebellion.

Mr. STOKES. It is well known to this House that on a former occasion I took very high and strong ground against the repeal or modification of the test-oath. I would do it again to-day. I would not now record my vote to repeal or modify that oath generally. But this is an extraordinary case of my colleague. Here is a man who presents himself to this body and asks us to permit him to take his seat. He comes from one of the most loyal districts in the State of Tennessee. He comes here by a larger majority than any other member from that State. He comes with a larger majority of soldiers' votes than any other member from that State. He comes into this House with a majority of nearly eleven thousand votes of the true and loyal men of Tennessee. Here is an honorably discharged Federal soldier, who has served his country, with his discharge in his pocket, a man who put his only son in the Union Army to defend the flag of his country. The committee have wisely, as I think, prescribed a way by which this man can be permitted to take his seat in this Hall, and I for one shall vote for the amendment of the Senate with a great deal of pleasure. At the same time I do not in any way interfere generally with the test-oath. I hope the House will pass the amendment, and do justice not only to my colleague but to the soldiers and loyal people of his district who sent him here. I ask the House to stand by the proposition of the Senate.

Mr. CHANLER. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. DAWES. I will yield three minutes.

Mr. CHANLER. I am very much obliged.

Mr. DAWES. I would willingly let the gentleman have all my time so far as I am concerned.

Mr. CHANLER. Oh, I understand—five minutes to Tom and three to Dick. I do not require one minute to state this case probably. But this question is an illustration of the whole course of these proceedings. I am for universal amnesty.

A MEMBER. And universal suffrage?

Mr. CHANLER. But I do not think this is the way to begin. I do not think this is a fair test of the sentiment of this House universally expressed as it should be in a vote for the admission of that member. There is no doubt that during the rebellion Mr. Butler represented a constituency in the rebel government. I understand that he went there on the broad principle of representative government, because that was a government de facto of his section of the country. Under that principle every member of the rebel congress was entitled to his seat in such political organization as was shut off from the administration of this Government by existing war. Universal amnesty looks to the admission of every member of the rebel congress with as much justice, right, and logic as we are now about to confess in admitting this member from Tennessee. I do not wish to oppose on any personal ground the admission of this gentleman, but I hope the House will go further and throw open the door to Mr. Butler's colleagues in the confederate government, where he sat and voted and acted with them, as illustrated by the position in which he put himself upon the Duncan letter, already fully exposed to the House and the country.

Mr. DAWES. I believe my friend was for him when the bill was up before.

Mr. CHANLER. Your friend is for the admission of every man who can show a good record.

Mr. DAWES. Well, that includes this gentleman.

Mr. CHANLER. Excuse me; you exclude a great many gentlemen who are as good as this one, and I am arguing exactly on that point. Does the gentleman propose to let him and all others in here because like me he is in favor of universal amnesty? Oh, no; but because this gentleman will, in case of a defeat before the people and in the Electoral College, when he comes here, vote with a certain organization to elect the Chicago candidates by a vote of this House. He is merely organizing for another election for presidential candidates to admit this gentleman upon this floor by a partisan vote, and five minutes are allowed to one man and three minutes to another to state the facts of the case. I am quite willing that this shall go before the people as a proof of the breadth and depth of the earnestness of the chairman of the Committee of Elections, and his principles and practices in organizing his party for future victory. But if he intends to organize this Government upon representative principles, let him admit the colleagues of this gentleman from Tennessee who are now excluded from any positions under this Government by express law as being outside of the pale of loyalty.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has had four minutes, and his time has expired unless the gentleman from Massachusetts extends it.

Mr. CHANLER. That would be asking too much. I will ask permission to leave the question with a brilliant flash of silence.

Mr. DAWES. Being sure of my friend's vote in carrying the measure, I will not quarrel with his reasons. I now yield for three minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.]

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not think it will require three minutes for me to say that in giving my vote on this question I shall be governed by precisely the same considerations which two years ago controlled my vote here on a similar question that related to a gentleman from my own State who was an applicant for a seat in the Senate, and who, like the applicant in the present case, had been during the war a Union man, as this gentleman has been. I was, therefore, in favor, as I expressed myself at the time, of opening a side door to let in a friend to the Government, while I kept the main entrance guarded to keep out its enemies; and it is upon that principle that I shall cast my vote in favor of the present bill.

Mr. MULLINS. Will my colleague allow me one minute?

Mr. MAYNARD. Certainly; I yield my colleague the remainder of my time.

Mr. MULLINS. This man voted men and money to the confederate government that hampered me and ruined my means and put Union citizens in jail, and I cannot vote to admit him. I wish him no harm, and I hope his God will forgive him for it. I can forgive it, but I cannot break down the barrier.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not stand here vindicating or attempting to vindicate anything that other gentlemen may have done; it is as much as I can do to vindicate myself. While the course of other Union men during the war may have been different from that of my friend, and different possibly from what I would have adopted under like circumstances, yet when I know that a man was a friend of his country, and that he acted for what he believed to be the good of his country, I will not stand here and challenge him on a mere question of judgment even if his judgment should fail to coincide with my own.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DAWES. I now move the previous question.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield to me for a few minutes?

Mr. DAWES. I cannot yield.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. I want the gentleman to answer a question which may determine my vote.

Mr. DAWES. I will hear the question.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. I voted for the bill now before the House when it was formerly under consideration. I desire to inquire now whether or not this proposition is intended to be under the proposed fourteenth constitutional amendment, and whether unless this bill be passed by a two-thirds vote Mr. Butler may be sworn in as a member of this House; and whether or not it is competent for this House to pass upon Mr. Butler's case and admit him, whether this bill receives a two-thirds vote or not. The answer to these questions may determine my vote upon this measure.

Mr. DAWES. I do not know by what rule the gentleman would cast his vote against this bill under these circumstances. If it is right that these disabilities should be removed I should suppose that fact would govern his vote. But that is not a matter for me to determine. If this bill passes by a two-thirds vote, then it steers clear of all question under that constitutional amendment, whether it be now a part of the Constitution or not. If it does not pass by a two-thirds vote, then, if that amendment is a part of the Constitution, this bill will be of no avail. I call the previous question.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. The gentleman has not answered my question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question was ordered, which was upon concurring in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. MULLINS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered. The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 99, nays 28, not voting 62; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Barnes, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boyer, Broomall, Buckland, Calk, Churchill, Cleaver, W. Clarke, Cook, Cornell, Dawes, Delano, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Elin, Elliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Gravelly, Hawkins, Higby, Hill, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Jenckes, Judd, Kelsey, Kitchen, Koontz, Lafin, Lincoln, Loughridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercer, Moore, Morrill, Myers, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, O'Neill, Paine, Peters, Pike, Pile, Plants, Polsley, Pomeroy, Randall, Raum, Sawyer, Schenck, Seofield, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Eihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, and Woodward—99.

YAYS—Messrs. Adams, Burr, Cary, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cullom, Eldridge, Golladay, Grover, Halsey, Harding, Johnson, Julian, Knott, McCormick, McCullough, Miller, Mullins, Price, Pruyn, Spalding, Stone, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Trump, Van Wyck, and Ward—28.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Baldwin, Barnum, Beck, Boutwell, Brownell, Brooks, Butler, Coburn, Covode, Donnelly, Finney, Fox, Getz, Griswold, Haight, Holman, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jones, Kelley, Kerr, Ketcham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Marshall, Moorhead, Morrissey, Mungen, Nunn, Orth, Perham, Phelps, Poland, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Aaron F. Stevens, Van Auken, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Thomas Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—62.

So the amendment was concurred in.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. MYERS said: I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. KELLEY, is still detained at home by illness.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXTRA PAY OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYÉES.

Mr. BINGHAM. I now move that a message be sent to the Senate asking for the return of House joint resolution No. 291, giving additional pay to certain employes in the civil service of the Government at Washington.

Mr. RANDALL. Is that a privileged question?

The SPEAKER. A motion is pending to reconsider the vote by which that joint resolution was passed, but it cannot be acted upon while the joint resolution is pending in the Senate. A motion to request the Senate to return the resolution for the purpose of enabling the House to dispose of the motion to reconsider is privileged like the motion to reconsider.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order, as the motion to reconsider is not now before the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I move to lay on the table the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] to request the Senate to return to this House the joint resolution referred to.

Mr. RANDALL. That will do just as well.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is not such a request as this always conceded as a matter of course?

The SPEAKER. Not always, necessarily. Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have never known it to be refused.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule upon the subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

"A motion to reconsider, if made in time, may be entertained, notwithstanding the papers connected with the original proposition have gone out of the possession of the House. And pending a motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of a bill, the Speaker should decline to sign the said bill if reported by the Committee on Enrolled Bills. [When the papers have been sent to the Senate, it is usual, in case of a motion to reconsider, to send a message to that body requesting their return.]"

The SPEAKER. The Digest says it is usual to send such a message; but no order can be adopted by the House except by a majority vote.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair, the answer to which may control my vote. If the joint resolution remains in the Senate, can we ever reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution passed this House?

The SPEAKER. No action can ever be taken upon the motion to reconsider while the joint resolution is not in the House.

Mr. MAYNARD. The motion to reconsider being made and now standing upon the record, could the joint resolution ever become a law without our acting upon the motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. That question is not now before the House, and the Chair declines to rule upon it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I want to know whether I am right in my view. If I am I will vote to lay the motion upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not decide questions of order in advance. The pending question is privileged, as the question out of which it grew is privileged. The motion to reconsider cannot be considered until the bill is before the House.

Mr. RANDALL. It seems to me that the rule does not bear the Chair out in the construction he has given to it. It says in case of reconsideration. Now, there has been no reconsideration. The motion to reconsider has only been entered.

The rule was again read.

Mr. RANDALL. I am wrong, sir, and you are right.

Mr. BLAINE. Has not the usage been for the Clerk to retain any bill or joint resolution within the period when a motion to reconsider can be made?

The SPEAKER. It has not. The usage has been the reverse. As soon as bills and resolutions are passed they are sent to the Senate. If they were retained it would delay important business of the session.

The question now is on the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. SPALDING. If that succeeds it disposes of the whole matter?

The SPEAKER. It disposes of this motion unquestionably.

Mr. WARD. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUTLER. What is the effect of the motion?

The SPEAKER. To lay the motion of the gentleman from Ohio on the table.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it possible to get back the resolution in any other way?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot anticipate the action of the House subsequently.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 52, nays 77, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Barnes, Boyer, Burr, Cake, Cary, Chanler, Cobb, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eldridge, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Gravely, Hotchkiss, Johnson, Kitchen, Lincoln, Mallory, McCormick, McCullough, Moore, Morrell, Myers, Niblack, Nicholson, O'Neill, Paine, Phelps, Plants, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Spalding, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Stone, Taber, John Trimble, Twichell, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, and Woodward—52.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bailey, Baker, Benaman, Beatty, Beck, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Delano, Dixon, Eggleston, Ela, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, Halsey, Harding, Higby, Hill, Chester D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Judd, Julian, Kelsey, Knott, Koontz, Lafin, Loan, Loughridge, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Mullins, Newcomb, Peters, Pike, Pile, Polsley, Price, Raum, Sawyer, Seofield, Selye, Shanks, Aaron F. Stevens, Taylor, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Van Wyck, Ward, Eihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, and John T. Wilson—77.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Barnum, Blair, Bromwell, Brooks, Sidney Clarke, Cornell, Dodge, Ferry, Finney, Fox, Garfield, Getz, Griswold, Grover, Haight, Hawkins, Holman, Hooper, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Jones, Kelley, Kerr, Ketcham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Logan, Lynch, Marshall, Moorhead, Morrissey, Mungen, Nunn, Orth, Perham, Poland, Robertson, Ross, Schenck, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stewart, Taffe, Thomas, Van Auken, Burt Van Horn, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—60.

So the House refused to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. BINGHAM's motion was then agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined, and found truly enrolled, Senate bill No. 534, relating to contested elections in the city of Washington, District of Columbia; when the Speaker signed the same.

JOSEPH POWELL.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution in connection with the resolution passed a few minutes since:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to Joseph Powell, contesting the seat of Hon. R. R. Butler, Representative from the first congressional district of Tennessee, in full for his expenses in taking testimony under direction of the Committee of Elections and prosecuting the contest, $2,000.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. How many votes did that man get?

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understand he only received sixteen votes.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I call for the regular order of business.

NEW YORK POST OFFICE.

Mr. FERRY, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1214) to provide for the erection of a building for a post office and the United States courts in the city of New York; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the committee.

Mr. UPSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SALE OF DAMAGED ARMS, ETC.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Military Affairs for present action a joint resolution (H. R. No. 292) directing the Secretary of War to sell damaged or unserviceable arms, ordnance, and ordnance stores.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think there is very great objection to this. I object.

LOYAL CHOCTAWS AND CHICKASAWS.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 300) for the relief of loyal Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. UPSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALEXANDRIA CANAL.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now commenced. The regular order is the call of the committees for reports, and the House resumes the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia (H. R. No. 892) relating to the Alexandria canal, which was pending at the expiration of the morning hour on Thursday last.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If I can have the attention of the House a few minutes, I think I can explain this bill in a satisfactory manner. In 1830 Congress chartered the Alexandria Canal Company. The House will remember that at that time the county of Alexandria formed a part of the District of Columbia, so that no other legislative authority could have created the canal company. In pursuance of the authority contained in that charter the company went on and built a canal and an aqueduct across the Potomac river at Georgetown.

In 1846 Congress retroceded to the State of Virginia the county of Alexandria, thereby, as it was supposed, conferring jurisdiction upon the State of Virginia over this corporation that had been created by act of Congress sixteen years before. In 1861 the State of Virginia went into the rebellion, and during the progress of the war the Government of the United States took possession of the canal and aqueduct. The canal was nearly destroyed. The aqueduct was turned into a bridge for the use of the Government and the public and used for five years for the transportation of troops, munitions of war, &c., into Virginia. During that period the old aqueduct was about worn out.

At the close of the rebellion the old company resumed possession and control of the canal, but found itself bankrupt and without the means to prosecute the work of repair. They therefore advertised that they would lease it to anybody who would take it for a term of years for a fair consideration. The gentlemen named in this bill came forward and made a lease with the old company for ninety-nine years for a certain consideration in money to be paid to the canal company. Fearing that the old canal company had no authority in law to make the lease, and that the State of Virginia had acquired jurisdiction over the company by the act of retrocession of 1846, these gentlemen, Messrs. Wells, Quigley, and Dungan, went to the Legislature of Virginia in 1867, I think, and secured the passage of an act authorizing the old company to make a lease and confirming any lease that they might make.

The question may be asked why Congress should ratify that grant or action of the Virginia Legislature. It may be said that it is a rebel Legislature. I think not. It will be remembered that Governor Peirpoint formed a government, and established its headquarters at Alexandria, during the rebellion in 1863, and that that Legislature was recognized by Congress when it required the assent of the Virginia Legislature to the creation of the State of West Virginia out of the domain of old Virginia. After the suppression of the rebellion this Legislature went to Richmond with Peirpoint at its head. In 1867 an election was ordered, which was acquiesced in by the administrative authorities of the Government after the suppression of the rebellion, and that election resulted in the election of members of the Legislature loyal to the Government of the United States, and who have been recognized as such up to this time. That is all the connection that the Legislature of Virginia has had with the subject. It is proposed that the corporation may have authority to make this lease, and the sanction of that Legislature is required.

Now, then, what is asked by this bill? These lessees of the old canal company have gone on and expended the necessary amount of money to put the old canal in thorough repair. They have built a new aqueduct at a cost of at least $250,000 to replace the old one which the Government used during the entire war without compensation to the old company. They now propose to build a bridge for the use of the public on the same piers and on the top of the framework of the aqueduct. It will make a very convenient bridge, as regards location, for the convenience of the public both in Virginia and in the District of Columbia. They propose to build a bridge and to be remunerated by the tolls that they shall collect. It will be remembered that there are two other bridges in the District of Columbia—the Long Bridge and the Chain Bridge—and the people will at all times have their option over which bridge they will cross. It will be entirely at their option whether they will use this bridge for compensation to the builders or not. That is all there is in this bill. The committee have examined the proposition thoroughly, and, I believe without a dissenting voice, have recommended the passage of the bill as a public convenience, interfering with no public or private rights whatsoever in the District of Columbia; and if nobody desires any further information I will ask the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Oh, I hope my colleague will not call the previous question. I hope he will let us discuss this bill a little.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I cannot yield for discussion at the present time. If my colleague proposes an amendment I will hear him, or I will yield for a question only.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am much obliged to my colleague for his courtesy. I would like to move some amendments to the bill. I do not know that it is in order to move an amendment if the gentleman insists on the previous question, but I presume the House would like to know something in regard to the bill before it votes upon it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not yield for the purpose of discussion. I have told the House something about the bill already, and if my colleague is not satisfied with the bill I will yield to him to offer amendments.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will suggest an amendment to my colleague.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object to debate. If the gentleman will suggest an amendment I will hear it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There is a provision in the fifth section of the bill that as soon as the bridge is so far completed as to be ready, fit, and convenient for the passage of persons and animals, &c., but there is no provision here as to who shall certify when the bridge is ready and fit. I propose to amend that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I yielded for an amendment, and not for debate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am stating an amendment and referring to the portion of the bill to which it is applicable. But I will first propose to strike out a portion of the fourth section. It provides that the said railroad shall be kept on the same footing as postal roads are required to be kept. There is no objection to that, but there is to what follows, namely, "and the same is hereby declared to be a postal road." I would like to know of my colleague why he desires to have such a provision as that in the bill?

Mr. INGERSOLL. What objection have you to it?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What is the purpose of making this particular piece of railroad specifically by law a postal road for the benefit of this company. Does the gentleman object to striking that out?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Well, not very much.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Well, let it be stricken out, then.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will say in reply to the gentleman from the Galena district, [Mr. WASHBURN]—for I want to treat my colleague with candor—the citizens of Georgetown many years ago in their corporate capacity brought an action against this Alexandria Bridge Company upon the ground that it was an unlawful structure over a navigable river, and was a nuisance. You will find the case reported in 12 Peters. The Supreme Court held in that case that it was not an unlawful structure; and confirmed the decision of the circuit court, which dismissed the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If that be so, then what is the use of this extraordinary legislation?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will tell the gentleman. No longer ago than last winter the citizens of Georgetown brought another action against this company upon the ground that it was an obstruction of the navigation of this river. The case was heard before the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and after an elaborate argument, and a long hearing, the court decided that it was a legal structure and not a nuisance, and dismissed the case. We have thus had the adjudication of those courts upon this question, and it is, perhaps, not really important for the interests of this company that Congress shall declare it a postal road, or a public way for the Government. But it can do no harm, and will put at rest the constant litigation that the citizens of Georgetown insist upon as against this company.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is just what I supposed was the reason why this was put in here. There is a matter of litigation between this company and the city of Georgetown.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Oh! no.
Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There has been.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir.
Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. And gentlemen want to come in here and cut off Georgetown and everybody else by putting this extraordinary provision in this bill.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] yield to me?

Mr. INGERSOLL. For a question.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I wish to inquire whether by a permanent provision of the present law all railroads are not postal roads now? That is my impression, and I once had something to do with this subject.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If that is so, then let this provision on this subject be allowed to remain in this bill. But I am not aware that such is the law.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I think it is.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I know that in the Wheeling bridge case the company was chartered to build a bridge; and the Pennsylvania Railroad Company brought suit against the bridge, because, as that company alleged, it was an obstruction to the navigation of the Ohio river.

Mr. BROOMALL. The city of Pittsburg brought the action.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think both the city and the company did so. The States of Ohio and Virginia chartered a company to build that bridge. One action was brought by, I think, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company; that is my recollection, though I may be wrong about that; still it was a Pennsylvania interest that brought the action. Up to that time there had been no congressional action whatever in reference to that structure. Subsequently to bringing that suit the bridge company came before Congress and asked for some affirmative legislation which should recognize it as a lawful structure. I do not say how that legislation was got through Congress, for I do not know. I was not here. I simply know the fact that affirmative legislation was had. And the Supreme Court after that recognized the action of Congress as valid and binding upon the Supreme Court when it declared that to be a lawful structure and a post road. I have not looked at the point whether all railroads are by general law declared to be post roads or not.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. They are.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It may be so; if they are not, they ought to be. However, if the House wants to strike out this provision I am willing that they should do so.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois; and it was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There is another amendment which I think my friend will be as willing to agree to as he has been to this amendment. It is provided that as soon as this bridge shall be completed for the passage of vehicles, &c., they shall be allowed to charge a toll. But there is no way in which that is to be determined; nothing is said about who is to determine that fact.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If no one can cross the bridge of course they cannot be made to pay any toll.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let the gentleman hear me. We ought to provide, before these parties shall be allowed to charge this toll, that their road shall be completed. I move to amend section five, so it will read as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That as soon as the chief engineer of the Army shall certify to the Secretary of War that said bridge is so far completed as to be ready, fit, and convenient for the passage of persons, animals, and vehicles, the said lessees, their successors, and their legal representatives, may demand, have, and receive, in advance, the following tolls; to wit: for any foot passenger crossing on said bridge, two cents; for any horse, mule, or jack, any ox, or other horned cattle, five cents; for any vehicle drawn by one animal, fifteen cents; drawn by two animals, twenty-five cents; drawn by four animals, thirty-five cents, but no extra charge shall be made for the driver of such vehicle; for any hog, sheep, or other live creature, one cent.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I agree to that amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. We ought to have the certificate of some officer that it has been built before toll is collected.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the amendment will be considered as adopted.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. After the word "cent," in the twelfth line, section five, I move to insert the following:

Which said certificate shall be published for three weeks in two daily papers in the city of Washington at the expense of this company.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I agree to that.

There being no objection the amendment was considered as adopted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There is another amendment which I hope the gentleman will agree to, and it is this: it is required that it shall be lawful for said lessees to commute those rates to persons requiring yearly passes. Of course it would be lawful without any legislation by Congress. I want to make it obligatory. This may be a great thoroughfare across which the people from Virginia will bring their market products, and it is of great importance that they should be permitted to commute. I want to amend the section so it will read as follows:

Provided, however, That it shall be obligatory on said lessees to commute those rates to persons requiring yearly passes at a reduction of the rates herein specified of at least twenty-five per cent.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object to that. Everybody permanently located on each side of the bridge would of course come and demand their commutation passes, and the result might be a great loss to the company. There is no obligation which compels the people to go over this bridge. It is a private enterprise. These parties have already expended $250,000 on this canal and aqueduct. They do not ask any aid from the Government. The gentleman asks something unreasonable, and I think unfair.

Mr. MULLINS. Inform me how much the Government paid toward this aqueduct? We now propose to give it to this company.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Nothing that I know of.

Mr. PAINE. I wish to offer some amendments.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will hear them.

Mr. PAINE. I move to strike out in section four these words:

And they may have such other rights and powers, and under such restrictions as at present are provided in the general railroad laws of the State of Virginia.

Inasmuch as this road comes into the District of Columbia it seems to me absurd that we should allow the State of Virginia, even if Virginia were admitted into the Union, to make laws for the road; and I, for one, cannot vote for a bill which allows Virginia to interfere in this District in this way. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will allow me to move the amendment.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I agree to that.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. PAINE. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out the following words in reference to the connections of this railroad:

Or with any other railroad running to said city, or with any railroad running to Georgetown, in the District of Columbia.

The reason of that amendment, is that in passing this section as it now stands it will confer rights without any limit in the future. We should know what rights and powers we confer upon this company.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I agree to that.

There being no objection, the amendment was considered agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to inquire whether this is a report from a committee.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is.

Mr. BUTLER. Is the gentleman authorized to accept these amendments?

The SPEAKER. He has not done so. They were severally agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to ask this question: whether or not the piers and superstructure on which this railroad and bridge are to rest have not already cost the Government two million dollars nearly?

Mr. INGERSOLL. They have not.

Mr. BUTLER. How much?

Mr. INGERSOLL. All there is about that is this: during the progress of the work, some thirty years ago or more, the canal company threw a quantity of débris into the river, to some extent injuring the channel of the Potomac. A large amount of broken stone, earth, &c., accumulated, and there was complaint made with regard to it. Thereupon Congress appropriated $300,000 to the company upon condition that all that débris should be removed by the company, and that in future no more should be deposited there. At the time that appropriation was made the entire county of Alexandria, through which this canal was intended to and now does run, was within the limits of the District of Columbia, forming the territory over which Congress exercised exclusive legislation.

Mr. BUTLER. Who built these stone piers upon which the aqueduct rests mentioned in the second section? Did not Congress do that?

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir. The original canal company chartered by Congress received from Congress an appropriation of $300,000 upon the condition I have named; but, sir, if the Government should pay a reasonable compensation for the aqueduct which it used during the five years of the war, which it had exclusive control of, and in the use of it destroyed the canal and its franchise altogether, so that at the close of the war that property, which had cost a great many hundreds of thousands of dollars, was almost worthless, it would amount to far more than three hundred thousand dollars. The Government has almost destroyed this property without paying one dollar of compensation to the old company, and none is proposed to be paid now.

Mr. BUTLER. Why should the Government pay for damages done in the State of Virginia, which was disloyal, any more than in the rest of the rebel States?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Nobody proposes to pay for damages in that or any other disloyal part of the country.

Mr. BUTLER. That is the proposition.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir; that is not the proposition before the House. I demand the previous question.

Mr. RAUM. I ask the gentleman to allow the following amendment to come in at the end of the bill:

And provided further, That Congress hereby reserves the right to regulate the tolls on said bridge.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not think that Congress should reserve the right to regulate a private enterprise because it happens to be a bridge across the Potomac at Georgetown any more than the right to regulate the price of calico in Massachusetts. I do not allow the amendment to be offered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will admit the usual provision in bills of this sort. I presume he does not intend to have it passed without such a proviso as this, which I ask to be allowed to move as an additional section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the right is hereby reserved to Congress to amend, alter, or repeal this act.

Mr. INGERSOLL. All right.

The amendment of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. A single question. Is it understood that the amendment in regard to tolls and commutation is pending and to be voted upon?

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is not; Mr. Speaker, my time is rapidly running away, and I cannot admit that amendment. I have yielded very liberally, but I cannot yield any further. I demand the previous question on the bill and amendments.

On seconding the previous question there were—ayes 49, noes 23; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. INGERSOLL and HUMPHREY.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes sixty-four, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays on ordering the preamble to the bill to be engrossed.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The preamble was ordered to be engrossed—ayes 57, noes 40.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL SAFE DEPOSIT COMPANY.

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 579) supplemental to an act to incorporate the National Safe Deposit Company of Washington, in the District of Columbia, approved January 22, 1867.

The bill was read. The first section empowers the National Safe Deposit Company to receive on deposit from time to time such sums of money, not less than ten cents, as may be offered by tradesmen, clerks, mechanics, laborers, servants, minors, married women, and others, and to invest the same in stocks of the United States, or such other security or securities as may from time to time be authorized by the board of directors of said corporation. The corporation shall receive all sums of current money offered as aforesaid, and invest the same in the manner aforesaid, and as soon as practicable they shall allow to the depositors interest on their deposits, to be regulated by the board of directors, and they shall pay the amounts deposited, with the interest thereon, or any part thereof, not less than ten cents, to the depositors at the place of business of said corporation at any time during business hours, on demand.

The second section provides that the board of directors shall regulate the rate of interest upon deposits and publish the same annually; that interest shall not be allowed to any depositor until his deposit amounts to five dollars, the interest to be calculated by calendar months only, and no interest to be allowed for the fraction of a month; that deposits made by minors or married women may be repaid to them and their receipt shall discharge the said corporation from any further claims for sums so repaid.

The third section authorizes the company to receive and hold on deposit and in trust, estate, real and personal, including the notes, bonds, obligations, and accounts of estates and individuals and of companies and of corporations, and the same to purchase, collect, adjust, and settle, and also to sell and dispose of the same in any market in the United States or elsewhere without proceeding in law and equity, and for such price and at such times as may be agreed upon between them and parties contracting with them; that the company shall also possess and have the power to make insurance for the fidelity of persons holding places of responsibility and trust.

The fourth section authorizes the company to increase their capital stock to $500,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Certainly.

Mr. GARFIELD. If this bill is merely to provide for safe deposit, it seems to me perfectly proper; but as I caught the reading of the bill, it authorizes them to do a broker's business and insurance business. I did not hear the bill very distinctly, and I would like to ask whether the bill does allow a broker's business to be worked in under the charter which this bill grants?

Mr. INGERSOLL. There is nothing intended to be "worked in."

Mr. GARFIELD. I will take that back. I merely meant to ask whether this bill could not be so construed, or whether it may not be so intended, as to make this a brokers' company? Perhaps it may be all right.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will state all I know about this bill, and all that there is in it, so far as I know. I think not more than a year ago Congress passed an act chartering what is called the Washington Safe Deposit Company, like institutions having been created in nearly all the principal cities of the United States, being for the safe keeping of valuable papers or anything else of value inclosed in small compass. This corporation, chartered two years ago, went on and erected a building, within which it placed its vaults of the most superior kind, and engaged in the business specified in the charter. The company has been in operation now for something like two years; it has conducted its business in the most satisfactory manner. Yet, it being a new business, an experiment, it has barely managed, with the best of management, to pay its expenses, although it is composed of perhaps the best men in the community in a business sense. They now ask that their authority shall be extended so as to embrace the receiving on deposit of small sums of money; enlarging the power of that institution to some extent to that enjoyed by savings-banks.

Mr. PRUYN. Will the gentleman allow me to make a single remark?

Mr. UPSON. Is this a unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think so; with the exception of one member, perhaps.

Mr. PRUYN. Will the gentleman yield to me now?

Mr. INGERSOLL. For a moment, yes.

Mr. PRUYN. I have looked over this bill hastily, and I think several of its provisions are very proper. But there are some things mingled with the good which I think should not be there.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then move to strike them out.

Mr. PRUYN. I refer among other things to a provision giving to this company power to insure the faithful discharge of duties and trusts, connected with the power to exercise the rights of savings-banks. Now, these two things should not be coupled together; no savings-banks should incur such risks. I therefore move to strike out that part of the bill which authorizes this company to make insurances; in fact, I move to strike out the entire third section.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am willing to have that portion stricken out to which the gentleman objects, relating to insurance.

Mr. PRUYN. That section embraces two things; one is authorizing this company, now made a savings-bank, to act as general agents for buying and selling property of all kinds; the other is authorizing this savings-bank to insure the fidelity of persons holding places of trust and profit. Now, it strikes me that these two things are quite incompatible with the exercise of the power of a savings-bank.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Is not this a savings-bank already?

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is not.

Mr. BOUTWELL. What is it?

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is a safe deposit company, and nothing else.

Mr. PRUYN. I think it is a highly respectable and well managed institution.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will accept so much of the gentleman's motion as refers to the insurance power of this company.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have an objection to the details of this bill, and to the whole bill.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not yield to the gentleman to argue against the bill.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Then I hope the House will vote down this bill, for it contains propositions for different kinds of business, wholly incompatible with each other, and such as we should not pass in any bill.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It may be that the Republic will be overthrown if this bill should pass. I call the previous question upon it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Are we to have no time in which to discuss this bill?

Mr. INGERSOLL. There are but three minutes of the morning hour left, and it may be that this is the last of my political existence, at least so far as the Committee for the District of Columbia is concerned.

Mr. MAYNARD. I think the gentleman should allow an amendment to this bill, providing that the gross receipts of this company shall be taxed the same as the gross receipts of express companies are now taxed.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have no objection to that.

Mr. MAYNARD. Then I move the amendment I have indicated.

Mr. ALLISON. What does the gentleman mean by gross receipts?

Mr. MAYNARD. That is a term well understood in revenue laws.

The amendment of Mr. MAYNARD was then agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I now call the previous question.

The question was taken upon seconding the previous question; and upon a division there were—ayes 30, noes 38; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and this bill goes over until the morning hour of to-morrow.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate, pursuant to request, returned to the House the joint resolution (H. R. No. 291) giving additional compensation to certain employees of the civil service of the Government at Washington.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (S. R. No. 100) for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels of war and steam machinery, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 870) to remove the political disabilities from Ioderick B. Butler, of Tennessee; when the Speaker signed the same.

UNITED STATES MINT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Treasurer of the United States Mint, recommending an increase of the salaries of four clerks employed in said Mint, with the further recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with law, a statement of the contracts made by the quartermaster general's department during May, 1868; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LAFIN was granted leave of absence for ten days.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of House bill No. 1046, making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works, and for other purposes, on which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Eliot] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to call up my motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. It is not now in order.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to make a motion that is in order. I move that we proceed to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. ELIOT. Under the order of the House this bill is to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I ask the Chair if that is not so?

The SPEAKER. It is to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ELIOT. What is the rule in reference to the consideration of the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. When the House resolves to consider this or any other bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole it is understood to mean that it shall be under the five-minutes debate. If the bill were ordered to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole without limitation, then the hour debate would apply.

Mr. ELIOT. My understanding of the rule at the time the motion was made was that the bill should be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and that general debate was to be allowed; and after that was closed the bill should be open for five-minutes debate. Under that impression I supposed it would be competent for me to submit some general considerations on this subject, vindicating the action of the committee from suggestions made in the report which has been submitted by the minority of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he will submit the question to the House for them to determine, as they made the order. When appropriation bills are ordered to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole it has always been understood that they were to be under the five-minutes debate.

Mr. GARFIELD. I understood the Speaker to announce the other day, when it was agreed to consider this in Committee of the Whole, that the five-minutes rule would prevail. We are all aware of that.

The SPEAKER. That is the general usage. If the House understood it differently they can manifest it.

Mr. SCHENCK. Why should not the rule apply in this as in any other case?

Mr. ELIOT. I wish to say the construction now given to the rule is different from what I supposed the rule was. I am always glad to get rid of the necessity for making speeches.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is familiar with the usage, and during the many years he has been here he cannot recollect an instance where, under like circumstances, there has been anything but the five-minutes debate.

Mr. ELIOT. I do not question the construction of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. It is not the Chair's construction, but that has been the usage.

Mr. PAINE. Does it require unanimous consent for the gentleman to make his remarks?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it does.

Mr. PAINE. I hope the gentleman will not be deprived of the rights that he could exercise under the rules of the House.

Mr. ELIOT. I will not ask it.

Mr. PAINE. I desire the gentleman should have an opportunity to make the remarks he has prepared. I was about to make the motion unless unanimous consent was given. I hope it will be.

Mr. SPALDING. I am always pleased to hear the gentleman from Massachusetts, but I must object.

Mr. ELIOT. Then I will avail myself as well as I can of the privilege allowed me under the five-minutes rule. Of course I shall be unable to make some statements which it seems to me proper should be made to show the propriety of favorable action upon this bill. I suppose the only thing to be done now is to have the bill read item by item under the five-minutes rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will have five minutes on every clause of the bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suggest that several of the items be read, and then that the gentleman make a five-minutes speech; then several more of the items and another five-minutes speech.

Mr. ELIOT. It is hard to cut up a speech into five-minutes sections. [Laughter.]

Mr. CULLOM. I would inquire if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] is not willing to allow the gentleman from Massachusetts half an hour.

Mr. SPALDING. Not six minutes, Mr. Speaker. I will give him five. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELIOT. Mr. Speaker, I certainly will not, under the leave which has been granted me, take advantage of the courtesy of the House, but I will try to confine myself within the thirty minutes.

A MEMBER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] refuses to withdraw his objection.

Mr. ELIOT. I beg pardon. I will then come under the five-minutes rule.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I rise to inquire whether any portion of the bill has been read?

The SPEAKER. It has been supposed to be read in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Can the gentleman from Massachusetts speak before any portion is read?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman insists, the Chair will have the first clause read.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I insist on following the rule, because the Chair always insists upon it when I am out of order. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is rarely out of order; whenever he is the Chair will rule so. The Clerk will report the bill until some member proposes an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums of money be, and are hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction and superintendence of the Secretary of War, for the repair, preservation, and completion of the following works heretofore commenced under the authority of law, and for the other purposes hereinafter named: That is to say,

Mr. KELSEY. I rise to a point of order. The bill is not reported in accordance with the rules for reporting appropriation bills. It does not state the aggregate amount of money appropriated at the end of the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. That applies to the Committee on Appropriations only.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman will refer to my substitute he will see that I have conformed to the rule.

Mr. ELIOT. The objection comes too late.

The SPEAKER. The rule to which the gentleman from New York alludes refers exclusively to the Committee on Appropriations, which did not report this bill.

Mr. ELIOT. It is to be reported by paragraphs, and no paragraph has yet been passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill by paragraphs.

The Clerk read the first two items of appropriation, as follows:

For improvement of Superior City harbor, in the State of Wisconsin, $30,000.

For improvement of Wisconsin river, $40,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to strike out that paragraph.

Mr. ELIOT. The gentleman from Illinois does not propose to defend his motion, and I rise for the purpose of opposing it.

The SPEAKER. He waives his right by resuming his seat. The gentleman from Massachusetts can now have an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. ELIOT. The appropriation which is now the subject of consideration is for the improvement of Wisconsin river, in the State of Wisconsin. It rests, Mr. Speaker—and the committee have directed the report to be made—upon the recommendation of the War Department, and upon arguments which have been submitted to the committee through the Legislature of Wisconsin, by a memorial which has been printed and laid before the members of the House, stating very fully the objects of the appropriation and the great importance of the appropriation to the internal commerce of the country. I have in my hand the memorial from the Legislature which states the character of the improvement itself, the importance of it to the States in that section of the Union, the growing commerce of that region, and the plan of improvement which the Government, under the authority of surveys made by order of the House, has determined upon. I had a long interview with the distinguished engineer who has had the examination of this work in charge, at the instance of the chairman of the committee and of my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. WASHBURN,] who is more particularly interested in this locality, and I learned from him the arguments upon which the propriety of this appropriation rests. The work itself is one which has to be done if the Government of the United States proposes to continue the policy which has been laid down for the last three or four years in regard to internal improvements. It is not an exceptional case. It rests upon the same general grounds upon which all the appropriations which are asked for in this bill rest. I do not know whether the gentleman proposes to question the propriety of the policy. In former times, you know very well, sir, when the southern platforms ignored the power under the Constitution of making these appropriations, it was very difficult for the House, under the two-thirds rule, to get before the House a bill of this description. Do you not remember, Mr. Speaker, some eight years ago how earnestly the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] tried to get out of the Committee of the Whole a river and harbor bill for the purpose of bringing it to the attention of the House? There are not a great many of those now present who were in the House. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] and yourself, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] my colleague upon my right, [Mr. DAWES,] the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MOORHEAD,] and my friend from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] were here. We all witnessed the earnestness with which the gentleman from Illinois, who was then on the Committee on Commerce, struggled to get the bill, which I now hold in my hand, out from the Committee of the Whole. It was opposed upon the ground that the whole matter was outside the range of our action, and although upon that question there was a very large majority in favor of the measure, yet by a vote of 105 to 61 it was defeated.

Now, sir, since 1865, there have been two bills reported from the Committee on Commerce, with the assent of the whole committee—not of gentlemen of one political character, but of all political shades—for the purpose of improving the rivers and harbors of the country. The bills met the approval of the gentleman from Illinois. And yet at that time we had just come out of the war and were some hundreds of millions of dollars more in debt than we are now. But the representatives of the people in Congress recognized the duty which their constituents imposed upon them, to see that the internal improvements of the country were so made as that the cereal products of the West could find, in some cheap mode, transportation to the East. It is in the line of that policy that this appropriation bill is offered.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to amend the paragraph by striking out "forty" and inserting "twenty." This is an appropriation which I would be glad to see made if I thought the work practicable. It is an appropriation in which my own constituents are interested, and I may say deeply interested, and if I could see that there was anything practical in it I would be willing to vote for the appropriation. But I think I know something about this Wisconsin river. I have lived in the neighborhood of it for more than twenty-eight years, and I know that it has always been considered by the people there that the Wisconsin river is not practicable for steamboat navigation. Such is the treacherous character of the channel, sand bars being formed, and there being sudden rises and falls of the river, that before any railroad bridges were built, and in the face of every effort to navigate that river in order to bring its commerce down the Mississippi to Dubuque and Galena, we found it necessary to abandon all attempts.

At the last session of Congress an appropriation of $40,000 was made for this purpose. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] says that I assented to that river and harbor bill. I do not know but that I may have given it a sort of assent. I had very little to do with it. I was sick, and I believe when the bill passed I was not present. But I find that there is an appropriation here of $40,000 for the improvement of the Wisconsin river.

Well, sir, I am sorry to say that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] did not read the report of General Warren on this subject. According to that report this improvement which we are now asked to initiate will cost, before it can ever amount to anything, from two million three hundred and sixty thousand to three million five hundred and forty thousand dollars. And let me say here that I do not believe there is money enough, and will scarcely be money enough to spare in the Treasury for the next ten years, to make that river navigable, unless you construct a canal from its mouth, where it empties into the Mississippi river, up as far as the portage. And yet it is here proposed, in the present condition of the public Treasury, to commence this improvement which, according to the lowest estimate of General Warren, will cost the Government some three hundred and sixty thousand dollars. I say that we cannot afford to undertake works of this kind, which do not promise us more and greater results.

The idea has been practically abandoned of making this a navigable river. If gentlemen will be good enough to read the report of General Warren, they will see that a great deal of it refers to bridges that have been built over the river, and to the cost of dredging away the obstructions which those bridges have made. And then in addition to that he says it will require an annual appropriation of from twenty to thirty thousand dollars.

I have no time, in five minutes, to refer much to the general subject of river and harbor improvements. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] says I was at a certain time in favor of river and harbor improvements. I was; but it was at a time when we had money in the Treasury, at a time when the people were not loaded down with debt. I was then willing to make liberal and proper appropriations. But times have changed, and I confess that my notions upon the subject have changed to some extent. I do not believe, to the extent I formerly did, in making appropriations for every object of the kind in the country; $20,000 for a harbor here, $40,000 for a harbor in some other place, and $50,000 for some other harbor, and so on. I do not now believe in making these appropriations for local objects, where they have no public interest.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say but a word or two in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.] I am surprised that he should be found opposing this particular appropriation in this bill. There is no proposition contained in this bill for the improvement of any harbor, or for any purpose whatever, that affects the interests of so many people as this very appropriation for the improvement of the Wisconsin river. In the brief space of five minutes allotted to me I cannot enter upon an argument upon this subject, but can only urge upon members the general statement of its importance to the grain growing region of the West, to every farmer who cultivates the soil of four States adjacent to this improvement.

The gentleman says that the Wisconsin river cannot be made navigable. In that he disagrees with the best engineering talent of this nation. This river has been examined over and over again by the engineer bureau of the War Department, and they all say that it can be made navigable. This appropriation of $40,000 is but a small one, and is really intended to verify the statements made by those distinguished engineers, and to prepare the work so that improvement upon a scale commensurate with our necessities may be entered upon in the future.

I tell the gentleman from Illinois that not only his constituents, but the people of four States of the West are vitally interested in the progress of this work. It will cheapen the expense of transportation from the Mississippi river to the lakes at least thirty per cent. Every article that is raised in the northwestern States will be transported up and down that river if it is properly improved. Every man who raises a bushel of grain in Iowa, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, is now compelled to pay tribute to the great railroad corporations of that region.

No man I ever heard of before ever said that this was not a convenient water communication. Vessels have passed up and down that river for years. It is a mistake to say that this river cannot be made navigable by means of a reasonable appropriation expended upon it. It is true that General Warren suggests it may cost from two and a half to three and a half million dollars to make this work complete.

Now, I know this does not appear to be an Illinois river; it is a Wisconsin river in this case. But though it does lie north of the State of Illinois, yet I would call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that there is a vast region of country north of this Wisconsin river, and west of it, and south of it, which will be benefited by this improvement.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Why does the gentleman refer to the Illinois river?

Mr. ALLISON. I referred to the fact that this is a Wisconsin river. And the people of a large region of country are interested in the improvement of this river, and desire to avail themselves of a cheap water communication by way of the lakes to the Atlantic sea-board. If that appropriation is not to be made, then there ought not to be one single item of appropriation made in this bill. I regard it as the most important appropriation made there, not because it affects my constituents alone, but because it affects that great grain-growing region of country. It affects the price of grain in New England and New York, and the price to the consumers of all articles transported from the East to the West and the West to the East.

This Wisconsin river passes a point where there is a canal only one mile and a half in length, and that connects the Fox river with the Wisconsin river. It is acknowledged to be the cheapest means of communication between the Mississippi river and the lakes by way of Green bay; and I ask gentlemen to remember that I speak here not only on behalf of four million people who cultivate the soil, but on behalf of the toiling millions of the eastern States who are consumers of our products.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I move to increase the amount to $50,000.

Mr. Speaker, the Wisconsin river, being a large portion of it in my district, and there being a large number of people living upon it, and being useful, indeed, in navigation, I feel bound to say a few words to sustain this appropriation. Now, sir, the object of this appropriation and the object of the improvement of the Wisconsin river is to give complete navigation from the Mississippi river to the lakes. This is to create a ship-canal between the Mississippi river and the lakes. It is alleged the Wisconsin river is impracticable and cannot be made navigable for that purpose. I am not here prepared to say whether it can or cannot. It is the opinion of General Warren that by the expenditure of the sum of $3,000,000 it can be made so navigable. If it can be made so navigable no appropriation of money could be made so advantageous to the country as this, for I could easily demonstrate that the country could save $3,000,000 annually by the aid of a ship-canal from the Mississippi river to the lakes. The distance is some two hundred miles. I will say further that you have appropriated to the Fox river for the purpose of improvement a very large amount of land. The Fox river has been improved. Slack-water navigation has been created; and there is a canal from Wisconsin river and the slack-water navigation to Green bay.

Mr. WOODWARD. How do you propose to improve the Wisconsin river?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. General Warren, in the report which he has made on the subject, shows you how he proposes to do it. He proposes to improve the bed of the Wisconsin river not by a canal, but by a system of dams.

Mr. WOODWARD. There is no water there.

Mr. ALLISON. There is plenty of it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I will state the character of the Wisconsin river.

Mr. WOODWARD. I know something about this river, and I say there is no water there.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says he knows something about that river. That may be, but I know something about it. I have lived near its banks longer than I dare say, twenty-five years at least. I know it is a very bad river, not for the want of water, for there is abundance of water, but it has a very wide, sandy bed and the channel is constantly shifting. There is enough of water if you will confine it. You may know there is water enough when I tell you that the river is three or four hundred miles in length and drains an extensive region of country. It is the largest river in Wisconsin. There is abundance of water if it can only be controlled. This bill proposes rather as an experiment an appropriation of $40,000. If it appropriated $3,000,000 I would not vote for it, because I am by no means certain on the plan recommended by General Warren successful navigation can be obtained. But I do desire this appropriation of $40,000 should be made.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. For what purpose?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. As an experiment.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COBB. I rise to oppose the amendment. I understand from the report of the engineer, General Warren, that $40,000 is all that it is desirable to have appropriated at this time, and that it is contemplated to use that money by way of experiment by constructing a wing-dam to test the practicability of the improvement of this river. Therefore I oppose the increase as moved by my colleague. But my principal object in seeking the floor is to reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] in regard to its being conceded by everybody that this river is not susceptible of improvement so as to make it navigable. I think the gentleman is mistaken in his assertion. A considerable portion of this stream passes through the district which I have the honor to represent, and I know that it has always been the opinion of those best acquainted with the stream that a very trifling outlay of money judiciously applied would make it navigable the year round. It is true that the navigation of it has been abandoned; I have seen a great many steamboats navigating it in years gone by, and it has always been the opinion not only of engineers, but of the numerous raftsmen who have navigated the stream since the settlement of the country, that it is capable of being made navigable all the time. There is plenty of water, as has been observed, but being spread over a wide bed the depth is so shallow that sand bars are formed which are constantly shifting, so that an acquaintance with the channel of the stream at one time does not enable the pilots to understand it at another. But notwithstanding all this, engineers give it as their opinion—and in this they are confirmed by the raftsmen—that by the system of wing-dams at a great many points in the river this difficulty may be overcome; and I believe such will be the result. I hope the appropriation will not be stricken out.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to make it $80,000 instead of $40,000. There are two or three questions about making this appropriation which I think the House will do well to consider. In the first place, the friends of this improvement say that the $40,000 proposed to be given here is only a small beginning, and that it will require $2,000,000 more to accomplish anything. Now, I think in giving the $40,000 we determine the question whether we are to give $2,000,000 hereafter, or to lose the $40,000 altogether. It is another question whether this improvement can ever be made, even if we determine to give the $2,000,000. Gentlemen who advocate it say that there is a very large quantity of water; that it is a very wide river bed; and that sand bars are formed which shift from one side to the other constantly, forming new channels. They propose, therefore, to have the river bed walled in and in some way confined. Now, it is very uncertain—and the friends of this appropriation will judge whether it is not so—whether if these $2,000,000 are finally appropriated the stream will after all be rendered navigable.

But, sir, back of all this there lies a very important consideration. This stream is all in one State. Almost all of it lies in the single congressional district of my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. COBB,] as he says.

Mr. COBB. A large portion of it, I said.

Mr. SCOFIELD. A large portion of it, then, lies in my friend's district. Another small portion runs through the district of his colleague, [Mr. HOPKINS,] and I suppose my friend behind me [Mr. PAINE] will claim some portion of it in his. But it is all in the State of Wisconsin. Now, sir, we have in the State of Pennsylvania just as large an improvement as that which is here contemplated. We have chartered a company and they have gone on and improved the Monongahela river; and other States are making similar improvements in the navigation of rivers lying within their limits. It is different when you come to a large river like the Mississippi or the Missouri or the Ohio. But when you take a comparatively small stream, which is very difficult of navigation and uncertain in regard to its improvement, although the State in which it lies may be benefited by the improvement, I submit whether this House should at this time enter upon the experiment of improving the navigation. Because if we appropriate this $40,000 we do enter upon it. And I submit to gentlemen who have matters in this bill about which there is no doubt, whether we ought to endanger the passage of just measures or absolutely necessary measures by putting in so many appropriations for new works, at a time when our national debt is every day increasing and our taxes are every day diminishing.

Mr. COBB. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: whether the improvement of the harbor at Erie is one of those just measures to which he refers?

Mr. HOPKINS obtained the floor.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Allow me a moment to answer the question.

Mr. HOPKINS. Very well.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I say to the gentleman that I do not want to mix up any interest I may have in the bill with that of anybody else. I want to vote fairly and honestly on each measure. Gentlemen may retaliate on me or on the interests of my district if they see fit, but I know my friends from Wisconsin are above any feeling of that kind. I shall vote on this question according to my judgment, and if, when the appropriation for the harbor of Erie comes up, that appropriation, if it is honest and just, and shall be defeated because I have fought against other measures, then my constituents will suffer.

Mr. HOPKINS. I quite agree with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] that this appropriation is, for its amount, more important in its character than any other one appropriation in the bill. I have not the statistics at hand, and if I had I should not have time to use them; but the territory tributary to this river raises to-day of wheat alone one hundred million bushels; and that amount of grain, which is mainly transported to the East, and from there to Europe, passes over the States of Wisconsin and Illinois upon railroads at an average cost of fifteen cents per bushel. This improvement, if completed, even at the cost estimated by the engineer department, of $3,000,000, will save that amount of transportation of grain, not only to the people of Iowa and Wisconsin and Illinois and Minnesota, but will save it to the consumers. The people of the East are as much interested in this improvement as we are in the West. The great want of the West is cheaper transportation of our surplus products. That country has already become the granary of this continent, and is destined to become ere long the granary of the world. The man who puts his finger or his foot on these works of internal improvement, which are so necessary to the development of that country, does an act of injustice to himself and his constituents and to the nation at large. This river is susceptible of being made navigable. It has a volume of water to-day that, if properly controlled, would float any boat that now runs on the Mississippi above Galena, and between that point and St. Paul. I have lived near this river for ten years, and nearer to it than my friend from Galena, and I assert that it is capable of being made navigable at a less expense than any other water navigation we shall ever have between the Mississippi river and the lakes.

Mr. MILLER. I understood the gentleman's colleague to say that this appropriation of $40,000 was merely to test an experiment.

Mr. HOPKINS. This appropriation of $40,000 is asked for at the suggestion of the engineer department for the purpose of building some wing-dams to control the current of the river, and see if that is the best way of improving it. It is undoubtedly the cheapest way, and if you will permit them to test it, we shall get an improvement which the gentleman from Pennsylvania, with all his ideas of economy, for which I honor him, and the gentleman from Illinois, will be proud of as citizens of the United States.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I understand the gentleman to say that this is the most feasible project for water communication between the Mississippi river and the lakes. I want to inquire if Rock river, which runs through the States of Wisconsin and Illinois, is not more feasible?

Mr. HOPKINS. I will say to my friend from Illinois that I am myself and my constituents are more directly interested in the Rock river than in the Wisconsin river. I should be glad to see Rock river improved, and I expect to live to see the day, if I live to the common age of man, when not only the Wisconsin river will be made navigable, but Rock river and the Illinois river also; and with those three great navigable rivers running through that territory which produces so much, we shall have what the West wants and needs.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. DELANO. I move to reduce the amount to $5,000, not for the purpose of occupying the time of the House in reference to this particular item of the bill, but to direct the attention of the House to some general views and ideas connected with the bill.

This bill appropriates for lake harbors, $811,000; for close harbor, $318,000; for the improvement of rivers, $2,741,000; for the purchase of certain localities, and a certain appropriation for the Portland and Louisville canal, $2,017,000, and for the continuation of surveys, $260,000; in all, $6,141,000. It will be observed by those who analyze this bill that there are thirty-two lake harbors appropriated for; twenty-seven rivers appropriated for, and ten close harbors appropriated for. It is so arranged as to reach perhaps the individual interests of some seventy members of this House. It may be set down, to begin with, as an omnibus that a great many people can ride in.

Now, sir, if we were in a condition financially to commence this scheme of improvements, I am not prepared to say that I should be among those who would oppose it. But we have just crushed out a rebellion without regard to cost; we have nearly got through the work of restoration and reorganization; and if there is anything left for the Republican party now to do, which in point of importance is higher and above all other things, it is a proper and economical administration of this Government. We might part with this $6,000,000 for the purposes contemplated by this bill, without laying a burden upon the people which they could not endure; but we would be inaugurating a scheme which would lead to the expenditure of untold millions in the future.

In reference to the particular item immediately under consideration, the friends of the appropriation say that it is only an experiment to test the manner and practicability of carrying out the project of connecting the waters of the Mississippi river and the great lakes.

There is another project of connecting the waters of the Mississippi and the lakes by an improvement extending through the State of Illinois. And the people of Ohio desire to improve the connection they have made of the waters of Lake Erie and the Ohio river. But are we prepared to enter upon this scheme at this time? Is it just to the constituencies whose interests it is our duty to protect for us to pass such a bill as this at this time? In almost all cases covered by this bill the appropriations here proposed are but entering wedges to secure a way into the Treasury. The time may come when these appropriations will be required, but I deny that now is the fit and proper time to enter upon this policy of public improvements. At the proper time, when it is in order, I will offer an amendment to this bill, proposing a certain amount of limited appropriations for the preservation of such works as we have now in hand but which need a little more assistance, and leave this entire policy for action at some future day when our constituencies will be better prepared to bear the burden.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELIOT. We might as well meet this question now as at any time. And perhaps the particular appropriation now under consideration furnishes as good an occasion for the contest which it is evident this bill must meet as any item will afford. Sir, it is because these improvements are demanded by the people; it is because these improvements, although they cost money, are among the expenditures which are productive, or while they cost money return into the Treasury more money over and over again than they cost; it is because of those things that the Committee on Commerce instructed the reporting of this bill. Some of these measures are to a certain extent experimental. How can it be otherwise? There is no question that the improvement is demanded; there is no question that the interests of the country require it, and that a large amount of revenue will be produced to the country if the improvement shall be made. An appropriation is made at the beginning for the purpose of seeing how it shall best be done.

And upon this the question comes up whether, considering the present condition of the Treasury, it is or is not best for us to stop where we are. If it is, then let this bill be laid on the table. If the members of this Congress are prepared to go back to their constituents and say that because of the fact that we have just passed through a long and expensive war, and because we have a large debt to pay, therefore we have concluded upon the whole to let the whole system of internal improvements rest where it now is, be it so. But I predict that it would be the most disastrous policy we could pursue. This is no mere party question. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] has analyzed this bill and found so many lake appropriations, so many river appropriations, so many appropriations upon the coast, and so many inland.

The object of the bill, sir, is to furnish ways and means by which the industries of the country can be made operative, by which they can work so as to make the opportunities which God in his providence gave to us effective and available.

Mr. Speaker, of what value is it to us because in one season at the West an amount of grain can be raised which puts to shame the accumulations of Pharaoh in the days when the brethren of Joseph went down into Egypt to save their father from starvation? Of what avail is it, sir, if the constituents of the gentleman from Illinois have got to burn their corn for fuel, because they cannot convey it to market?

If we are to be told because the Treasury is in the condition in which it is we are to wait year after year until the time shall come, as the gentleman says in his report, when labor is lower, when money is more plenty, why, sir, let me say before that time has come, if these appropriations are made and these improvements carried on, the amount of money put into the Treasury by reason of these improvements will over and over again pay the expenses to which we are now subject.

Sir, we have got to appropriate four or five million dollars annually as one of the natural, fair, ordinary expenses of this Government if we do our duty as the legislators of this country, in which God has permitted us to live; and it is in vain to single out this item or that item for the purpose of raising on it a general argument against appropriations of this kind, unless, indeed, gentlemen propose to stop where we are.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in regard to this special appropriation. The Wisconsin river, as you know very well, enters into the Mississippi. The Fox river enters into Green bay. The object of the appropriation is to make such communication between Green bay and the Mississippi river as that the whole production there can be carried down to the Mississippi river, so along down to St. Louis and New Orleans and out to the ocean; or the other way, as my friend from Wisconsin says. This is the early part of the improvement.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ALLISON withdrew his amendment.

Mr. PILE. I move to make it $50,000 instead of $40,000.

Mr. Speaker, the wealth of this country, as of all others, arises from production, and production can only be stimulated and kept up by rapid and cheap means of interchanging commodities for the transportation of the productions of one locality to another, for the transportation of productions in excess to where they are wanted. These great avenues of industry have received from all wise governments careful consideration and encouragement. Until a very short period river and ocean and wagon transportation have been the principal medium of interchange of commodities from one locality to another. Recently the era of railroads commenced. They have been built in this country as well as in all other civilized countries; but it has been demonstrated that the railroad transportation is used for the interchange of light commodities, and that we must at last fall back and rely upon the river and ocean for the transportation of heavy commodities and the large agricultural products of the country. What the Mississippi valley needs, that wonderful region of the country, unequaled by any upon the globe, what it needs to stimulate its production is cheap transportation; and for that there must be competing lines of water communication. The Mississippi river must be improved, and its mouth and channels and outlets opened and deepened, affording constant and ready communication with the ocean. It is equally necessary we should provide for communication northward to the lakes, so that in the summer months it may be a perfect line of water navigation. Then the productions of the Mississippi valley will be transported either way cheaply and readily.

In the light of this fact, which bears directly upon this specific improvement that is now before the House, I think an appropriation of $40,000 as an experiment to test whether the plan submitted by General Warren, the engineer, is practicable, should be made without hesitation. It is true that if this river can be improved its ultimate improvement will require an expenditure of two million or two million five hundred thousand dollars; but if the experiment proves that it cannot be so improved as to render it navigable then the expenditure of $40,000 does not necessarily entail an expenditure of the larger sum.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does not the gentleman know that we appropriated $40,000 last year?

Mr. WOODWARD. I rise to express a few thoughts on the general subject before the House. I am opposed to all these appropriations. The rivers of the country are provided by nature undoubtedly for the transportation of the products of our country; and no more legitimate work can be proposed than to improve their navigation so as to enable people to get the products of their labor to market. I agree to that, and I agree with those western gentlemen who magnify the importance of that garden of the world in which they live; for such I believe it will come to be realized by the world, and that before many years. I look forward to the time when people abroad will depend upon the great West for the bread they eat; and I wish the people of this country generally would turn their attention to farming more than they are doing. I wish some politicians would turn farmers. It is undoubtedly true that the products of these fertile lands are to be carried to market principally by water, for they will not bear transportation by any more artificial communications. These things are all true, and the argument so far as these facts are concerned is with the gentlemen who support this appropriation.

But here is what I want to say: the Wisconsin river, if I understand it, rises, flows, and empties in the State of Wisconsin. Is not that the fact?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. That is so.

Mr. WOODWARD. Now, sir, upon what principle does that State come to the Congress of the United States and ask us to vote the money of the people of the United States in an abortive attempt to make that river navigable by steamboats? If the descending navigation of the Wisconsin be not sufficient for the people who live along its banks they should do what we have done in Pennsylvania who live along the Susquehanna—take our own funds and improve our own navigation for the purpose of carrying to market the products of our own industry. That is what they ought to do. The Susquehanna rises in New York, runs into Pennsylvania, runs back into New York, and then again into and through Pennsylvania, and empties into Chesapeake bay, in the State of Maryland. And yet you do not find the people along that river coming to Congress and asking an appropriation of money to improve it. On the contrary, we have got a canal, if not more than one, along the river, constructed by State taxes, out of State funds, under State authority. There it is, and the people have derived those advantages from it which gentlemen truly depict as likely to result from the improvement of the Wisconsin river. I agree that that river should be improved, but I maintain it should be improved by the people who are interested in it, as in the older parts of the United States they have improved the rivers upon which they depended. In a certain sense, it is true, everybody is interested.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. The gentleman insists that it should be improved by the State of Wisconsin. Would he also insist that when it is improved by that State and made a thoroughfare from the Mississippi to Lake Michigan the public should have the benefit of it?

Mr. WOODWARD. Most assuredly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. The public outside of Wisconsin?

Mr. WOODWARD. The State of Wisconsin cannot shut the people of the United States off from communication through that river.

Mr. VANTRUMP. If my honorable friend from Pennsylvania will allow me, I can add an important fact to the argument he is now making in regard to the State improvement of the Susquehanna river. Some forty years ago the State of Ohio, then in her infancy, projected and completed, without any appeal to the Federal Treasury for aid, a magnificent canal, running from Lake Erie to the Ohio river, a distance of more than three hundred miles, at a cost of several million dollars. And yet it today accommodates the commerce not only of Ohio, but of New York, Pennsylvania, and the New England States on the northeast, as well as of Kentucky, Tennessee, and other southern States on the southwest. Let other States, in regard to improvements confined within their own borders, go and do likewise, and then they will have some semblance of claim to ask Ohio, through her Representatives in Congress, to appropriate the money of the people at large to new local improvements.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. The State of Ohio taxes the public well, too, for the accommodation.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] allow me to ask him a question? It is rare that we get an opportunity thus to do it. While I am with him in the proposition—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PAINE obtained the floor.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope, by unanimous consent, the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be allowed five minutes to complete his remarks.

Mr. WOODWARD. I have never yet had time to get an entire idea before the House under the five-minutes rule. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAINE. So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing that the gentleman shall proceed.

No objection was made.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then I will finish the question I was propounding to the gentleman. The gentleman says that this Wisconsin river ought to be improved. He admits all that gentlemen claim for it, except the source from which they should derive the means to improve the river, and he tells us about the Susquehanna as being of great importance to the States of New York and Pennsylvania. Now, I ask the gentleman if there is not in this very bill an appropriation for the improvement of the Susquehanna, and is the gentleman going to oppose it?

Mr. WOODWARD. I am. I did not know there was such an appropriation in the bill. But I tell the gentleman that I am going to vote against that very appropriation, and I will vote against it as heartily as I will vote against the appropriation for the Wisconsin river. I am in earnest about this matter. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN], who first rose to oppose this bill, touched the real core of this question. This country is in no condition to waste money on these abortive attempts to improve rivers that their Maker made unnavigable, and which man never can make more than navigable for descending navigation. That is all you can do unless you make a canal, and if you want a canal let the State of Wisconsin make it. But the gentleman from Illinois touched the real sensitive nerve of this whole subject when he told us that in the present financial condition of the country—and I believe he said to which the Republican party had brought the country—we were in no condition to appropriate money for this purpose.

Now, I wish to respond with all my heart to that sentiment. Look at what has been passing here before us for the last few days. A bill was brought in by the Committee of Ways and Means to raise revenue to carry on this Government; a bill which shows that the whole ingenuity of that committee was exhausted to find objects of taxation; a bill which will bring the Government down upon the industries of the people as it never was brought down upon them before, and will grind the poor of this country into deeper dust than they have ever been ground down to before, and that for the main purpose of paying the interest on our bonds to the bondholders. While the genius, the wit, of this House is being employed necessarily to devise measures to screw money out of the people of this country to pay to the bondholders, many of whom are foreigners, I protest against a waste of these funds in an abortive attempt to improve western rivers that the western States ought to improve without coming to the General Government.

Mr. DELANO. The gentleman either misrepresents or misunderstood me. If I understood him correctly he said just now, alluding to my remarks, that I said the Republican party had brought the country into its present financial condition. I said no such thing.

Mr. WOODWARD. The gentleman speaks of misrepresentation. I have another matter, as you well know, Mr. Speaker, which I would like to have an opportunity to explain, and if I had misrepresented the gentleman he would not have been the first member on this floor who has borne gross misrepresentation; but I did not allude to the gentleman. I intend no misrepresentation of any gentleman, and least of all of the gentleman from Ohio. I maintain that it is due to the people of this country that we should gather up all our energies and concentrate all our forces upon providing means for reducing and removing this national debt. Let me tell gentlemen that that debt has grown $10,000,000 in the last month.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PILE. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. PAINE. I renew it. Mr. Speaker, it is a mistake on the part of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who has just taken his seat, [Mr. WOODWARD], as it was a mistake of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTFIELD], who sits near me, to say that this is merely a Wisconsin measure, that it a local object which is to be promoted by this appropriation.

Sir, it is indeed true that this river lies wholly within the territorial limits of the State of Wisconsin. But the object of the improvement is to connect the head-waters of the Mississippi river with the chain of great lakes on our northern frontier, and although the State of Wisconsin, as I freely admit, has probably more direct interest in this improvement than any other single State, it is not true that the benefits of this appropriation will be confined to the State of Wisconsin alone. The State of Iowa has little less interest in this improvement than has the State of Wisconsin. I am not sure, sir, that the State of Iowa has not an equal or even a greater interest in it than Wisconsin. The State of Illinois is certainly very greatly interested in this appropriation. The agricultural exports and bulky imports of the western portion of that State will undoubtedly seek this channel, if successfully opened, as their outlet to and inlet from sea-board and foreign markets. The same will be true to some extent of the exports and imports of the State of Minnesota, and also of the States of Missouri and Nebraska.

More than that, sir, every manufacturing and commercial State between the Alleghanies and the Penobscot having an interest in the reduction of the cost of bread or the expansion of northwestern trade will see her own prosperity promptly and sensibly stimulated by this or any successful development of a water transit for agricultural products from the Northwest to the sea. It is not, then, a petty, local project. It will be no more a local improvement than is that of the Falls of St. Anthony, which is altogether within the State of Michigan, or the improvement of the St. Clair river, which touches only a single State. Why, sir, like the Niagara ship-canal, like the canal around the falls of the Ohio, this channel of trade, while situated in a single State, will bear back and forth the commerce of many States, will form a link in a great chain reaching from New York through the valley of the great lakes and the valley of the Mississippi to New Orleans. The great and rapidly growing agriculture of the Northwest must have a water outlet for its products to the sea. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] admitted, they will not bear the necessary cost of transportation by railway; they must be transported by water. This is not less vital to the consumer than to the producer of bread.

Look, for an illustration, at the State of the gentleman who opposes this appropriation so strenuously, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN]. In the year 1865 his State produced over one hundred and seventy-seven million bushels of corn alone. The precise amount was one hundred and seventy-seven million ninety-five thousand eight hundred and fifty-two bushels. That corn was worth in his State, on an average, only twenty-nine and a quarter cents per bushel, while in the six New England States, at the same time, it was worth on an average $1 19 cents per bushel, and in New York it was worth ninety cents per bushel. The difference between the aggregate value of this corn crop of 1865 on the soil of Illinois and its value in the market of New York was $116,883,262 32.

It would have cost the constituents of the gentleman from Illinois, and the other gentlemen representing that State on this floor, more to transport that corn crop alone to the New York market than the entire agricultural products of that State for 1865 were worth on the soil of the State. It would have cost more than the home value of the entire crop of Illinois, including wheat, corn, oats, potatoes, hay, and everything else raised that year by the people of that State. The entire crop of corn, wheat, rye, oats, barley, buckwheat, potatoes, tobacco, and hay, was worth at home only $116,274,321, and the difference between the home market and New York market of the corn alone was, as I said, $116,883,262 32.

And why? Because the cost of railway transportation renders it utterly impossible for his constituents and for the people of Illinois generally to transport their heavy products to the markets of the East by rail. The Northwest must have improved means of water transportation to the sea. And nature has indicated to us the great routes which we must take. A thousand miles from the Atlantic and the Mexican Gulf, the wonderful valleys of the lakes and Mississippi intersect. About their intersection lie the grain-growing States which are able to feed not only the people of this Republic, but the people of other nations also.

In the first place, we must have through the northern valley water routes around Niagara falls and from Lake Erie or the St. Lawrence or both to New York. And we must have the waters of the northern Mississippi connected with the waters of the great lakes by means of this improvement, or by means of the Rock river improvement, or by means of the Illinois river improvement, or in some other way which careful surveys and experiments shall show to be cheapest and best.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I agree thoroughly with every word that has been said upon the question of the ultimate necessity of water transportation for the agricultural products of this country. I agree, also, that under other circumstances it would be the duty of the General Government to aid in the improvement of that water transportation. I take no exception to anything that has been said by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] or the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PIKE] upon that subject. But I except to a statement that has been made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WOODWARD.] If I heard him aright, he said that this is the condition of things to which the country has been brought by the Republican party. I pray to differ with the gentleman in that judgment. It is a condition of things to which the Democratic party has brought this country.

And that is the foundation of my argument now. Because of what has gone before, because of the war just closed, we are now as a people so burdened with taxes, so troubled with exactions, that I think it is our duty to wait before we add to those taxes for the purpose of making improvements, however good in theory and however necessary in fact.

Wisconsin, Illinois, Iowa, have all grown to their present gigantic proportions without these improvements. They can wait one year longer without them, for their present growth is enormous. I agree to all that. I ask, then, which is best; whether we should go forward and attempt these improvements now or wait until we have got into a condition where we can be just before we are generous?

Sir, if we upon this side of the House are to stand upon anything as to the policy upon which we propose to go into the next campaign it is upon economy of administration. We have only this floor to show that desire. The Executive Departments of the Government, which substantially control the administration of the finances, are not within our reach or within our control; and the people must look here upon this floor as the only place where we, as a party, can exhibit the principles upon which we stand. If, then, we vote away at this time six or eight million dollars let me say to you that the people will say, "With our taxes we cannot afford to make the experiment;" and for this reason: without arguing the question as to whether these expenses are necessary or are promising great results or not, I say we are in no condition to meet these expenditures. You might as well ask one of the mill-owners of my State, who is so far in debt that his mill is mortgaged and he cannot get production to meet his expenditures, to go into great expenditure to improve his property and render it more productive at this moment. Wait until we are able, until we are able as a people, then I will vote for this and other expenditures of a like character.

I ask my friends from the Northwest which would they rather do—have these rivers improved this year, and upon the charge of extravagance which will be made against us in the country, have power pass out of our hands and so prevent future improvements—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELIOT. I move that all further debate be closed on the pending paragraph in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELIOT. I now yield to my colleague.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to engage in the discussion of the general subject; but I will say, in my opinion, this country is to be changed and improved before it will be able to pay the interest on its public debt. There must be something done, sir, for the industry of the country.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to know, Mr. Speaker, what question the gentleman from Massachusetts is authorized to discuss. Is there any amendment now pending?

The SPEAKER. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. PAINE. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BANKS. I renew it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. How can the gentleman speak when the House has closed debate?

The SPEAKER. It was ordered to be closed in five minutes.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desired an opportunity to speak myself.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts was to close debate in five minutes and it was adopted.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, I do not regard the proposition to improve the Wisconsin river as an experiment. I do not think it will prove an abortive affair, as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WOODWARD.] I believe the plan of the Government engineer, General Warren, will be entirely successful and entirely satisfactory. I have seen this tried myself, and I cannot by any possibility doubt the result. I have seen, Mr. Speaker, large steamers embedded from five to six feet in the sand with the river bed apparently dry leaving a single little stream of water and then by the aid of wing-dams I have seen these steamers lifted up by the power of water alone and floated into the river. I have seen that done; and I am just as confident that this proposed plan of the engineer will make this river navigable as that I can go from my place outside of this Hall, and at a cost of less than $40,000. The effect will be marvelous. The principle is perfectly simple. It is this: where the water is spread over a large surface it leaves no depth and allows no navigation; but if you collect that water by means of these wing-dams into a single channel just wide enough to admit a steamer, you may increase the depth of the water from five or six inches, or even where there is apparently none at all, to the depth required for steamboat navigation. I would not have believed it had I not seen it tried; but having seen it, I know that the result of this experiment will be an entire success. Therefore I shall vote for the proposition.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire, in the remaining time of the gentleman, to call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] to the report of General Warren in regard to the expense. The gentleman says it can be done for $40,000. What does General Warren tell us in this official document will be the expense of the improvement which my friend undertakes to inaugurate to-day? It is twenty to thirty thousand dollars a mile! That amount of money is to be taken out of the Treasury in order to attempt the experiment of making this river navigable.

Mr. ELIOT. I desire to say that I do not represent the views of Massachusetts upon this question, but rather the views of the West in spite of the opposition of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not yield to my friend to interrupt me in this way.

Mr. ELIOT. I think I am entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to the remainder of the time, if he claims it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. Whose time is it now?

Mr. BANKS. The gentleman from Illinois has no right to speak in my time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think I have spoken in the gentleman's time. [Laughter.]

Mr. BANKS. I withdraw the amendment.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to make a suggestion to facilitate our action on this bill.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to make a suggestion to close debate. It is in relation to voting. Will the gentleman hear it?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. No, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise

then to a question of order. Has not the House a right to take the yeas and nays on every separate proposition in the bill?

The SPEAKER. After the House has passed through the bill as in Committee of the Whole, making various amendments, when the question recurs, Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time? a separate vote can be demanded on every proposition that remains in the bill not having been stricken out.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The suggestion I make is that: that having that right to a separate vote on the various propositions we shall save a great deal of time after we have discussed the various propositions by letting them pass, and when it comes to the engrossment we can have a separate vote.

The SPEAKER. That can be done by withdrawing the motion to strike out.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand that, and I withdraw my motion to strike out the pending paragraph. I shall, however, demand a vote in the House on the main proposition. I do not care about taking up the time now, as it merely involves two votes. That is all there is of it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule on page 16 of the Digest.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Upon the engrossment of any bill making appropriations of money for works of internal improvement of any kind or description, it shall be in the power of any member to call for a division of the question, so as to take a separate vote of the House upon each item of improvement or appropriation contained in said bill, or upon such items separately, and others collectively, as the member making the call may specify; and if one fifth of the members present second said call, it shall be the duty of the Speaker to make such divisions of the question, and put them to vote accordingly."

Mr. PHELPS. I wish to inquire at what precise point of time it is competent to ask for that division?

The SPEAKER. When the question is stated by the Chair, "Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?" a separate vote can be asked on any appropriation that remains in the bill and has not been stricken out.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether, the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] having been withdrawn, I have not now an opportunity of moving an amendment to the paragraph?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has, but without debate, because debate on the paragraph has been closed.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understood that it was only closed on the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. On everything in regard to the Wisconsin river.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not desire to move an amendment for the purpose of amendment, but for the purpose of speaking to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot do that under the order of the House.

Mr. SPALDING. This bill being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, is it in order at any time to move to lay the bill on the table?

The SPEAKER. This being the House, the motion to lay on the table can be made.

Mr. SPALDING. At any time?

The SPEAKER. At any time. It would not be in order in Committee of the Whole, but being in the House as in Committee of the Whole, the double privileges of the House and of the Committee of the Whole are vested in the body in acting on the bill.

Mr. WOODWARD. On the motion to lay on the table I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] did not make that motion.

Mr. WOODWARD. Then I make the motion.

Mr. ALLISON. And on it I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. ELIOT. I hope this will be considered a test vote.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will withdraw his motion. There will be a substitute offered which I think will be satisfactory to the House.

Mr. JENCKES. I rise to a question of order. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. That is not a question of order.

Mr. JENCKES. It relates to a question of order. Is not the order of the House that the bill shall be considered as in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. JENCKES. Then how can a motion to lay on the table be entertained if the bill is being considered as in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. Precisely for the same reason that the yeas and nays can be called in the House on any proposition now pending before it. They cannot be called in Committee of the Whole, yet they may be in the House when the House is acting as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JENCKES. Does the Chair decide that the yeas and nays can be called now on any proposition?

The SPEAKER. They can.

Mr. JENCKES. I should raise the same question of order on that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would answer it by the Constitution of the United States, which declares that "the yeas and nays of the members of either House on any question shall, at the desire of one fifth of those present, be entered on the Journal." That does not apply to the Committee of the Whole, but it does to the House of Representatives.

Mr. WOODWARD. I withdraw the motion to lay on the table.

The Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

For improvement of Ontonagon harbor, Lake Superior, $20,000.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. For the purpose of saying a few words I move to strike out that paragraph. I do not know anything about this harbor, or whether the appropriation is a proper one or not. But I, for one, do not propose to ride in this omnibus—

Mr. ALLISON. I rise to a point of order. I insist that the gentleman must confine his remarks to the paragraph.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Well, if the gentleman does that the same rule must be enforced on other gentlemen.

Mr. ALLISON. That is what I want.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to state his reasons for moving to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I understand that a substitute for the bill has been prepared which provides for some of the most important works. I am myself in favor of general appropriations for rivers and harbors; but I am not in favor of making an appropriation for every little river and every little harbor that any gentleman may happen to have in his district for the purpose of getting his vote. There are some works of importance in the West. The St. Clair flats should be improved and harbors of refuge should be built, for they are works which pertain to the interests and commerce of the whole country. But at the present time to appropriate $10,000 to be thrown into Lake Michigan at this point, and another $10,000 to be thrown into it ten miles farther off, and another $10,000 to be thrown into it a few miles further on; to appropriate, as this bill does, $5,000 for this river and $5,000, for that, appropriations which, in the judgment of any candid man, cannot be of any importance whatever in prosecuting the works proposed, it seems to me is all very absurd.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether it is now in order to move a substitute for this entire bill.

The SPEAKER. A substitute for the bill can now be moved, but action upon it will be reserved until the original bill has been perfected.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It would save a great deal of time if we could act upon the substitute at once.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to say to my colleague [Mr. FARNSWORTH] that a substitute will be proposed, to be offered at the proper time, which I think will meet with his approbation and the approbation of a majority of this House.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I think this is no time for the Congress of the United States to enter upon new works of internal improvement. Our constituents do not demand it, the country does not demand it, and certainly the interests of the country will not be promoted thereby at the present time.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELIOT obtained the floor.

Mr. DRIGGS. I hope the gentleman will yield to me for one minute.

Mr. ELIOT. Very well; I will yield to the gentleman for one minute.

Mr. DRIGGS. I understood the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH], when he first rose, to say that he did not know anything about this harbor. That was, perhaps, one of the best reasons in the world why he should oppose this appropriation. Now, I want to say that I do know something about it. There was an appropriation made of $100,000 to build a harbor at one of the most exposed points on that immense inland sea, Lake Superior. The Government is now engaged in building that harbor, and the War Department has estimated for only just enough to keep the works there from waste and decay, to carry it along so as to have it protected until a more appropriate time to make a larger appropriation to complete the work. That is the real condition of it. I will only say now, because I have not more time, that I hope the House will not strike out this appropriation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELIOT. The objection made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] to this bill is that it is an omnibus bill. There has not been a river and harbor bill passed for many years which did not include in it all the points of importance which the Congress that passed upon it deemed it desirable to legislate for at that time. In earlier days it was the practice to introduce a separate bill for each particular point. But it was found to be inconvenient to do that, and the practice has grown up, which has been uniform for many years, to put all the appropriations for such purposes in one bill, and that necessarily makes what the gentleman calls an omnibus bill. This point, covered by the item now under consideration, is one upon which the Government has been and is now engaged at work in the expenditure of moneys heretofore appropriated. It is now in the course of construction. And the point made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] that he is in favor of harbors of refuge is met by the answer that this is just one of those points.

It is stated by the engineers who have had this matter in charge that this very point, Ontonagon, is important if there was no commerce at all there; of vast importance as a harbor of refuge. Therefore it comes within the principle of the substitute which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] has talked about, in which he makes provision for one harbor of refuge. This is a very important point in that respect. Now, sir, this is not a new work. It has been examined, surveys of it were made in the first place, and afterward appropriations were made. It is now in the course of construction and completion. It occupies the same ground in that regard that most all the appropriations in this bill do, for all of them, with here and there an exceptional case, are for works which are now in the course of completion.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. FARNSWORTH.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I moved that amendment with reference to this particular item merely for the purpose of submitting some general remarks. I now withdraw the amendment.

No further amendment was offered.

The following clauses were read:

For improvement of Eagle harbor, Lake Superior, $20,000.

For improvement of Marquette harbor, Lake Superior, $20,000.

For improvement of Green Bay harbor, Wisconsin, $35,000.

For improvement of Chippewa river, $5,000.

For improvement of Manitowoc harbor, Wisconsin, $35,000.

For improvement of St. Croix river, $5,000.

For improvement of Sheboygan harbor, Wisconsin, $20,000.

For improvement of Milwaukee harbor, Wisconsin, $15,000.

Mr. PAINE. I move to amend the appropriation for the improvement of Milwaukee harbor by increasing it to $25,000.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot state all the reasons for my amendment for want of time, but I think I have satisfied the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] that this increase ought to be made. I will read from page 22 of the estimates for these appropriations:

"An extension of both piers three hundred feet would postpone for many years the injurious results now threatened. This extension is therefore recommended by the engineer in charge, at a cost of $65,872 80. Deducting present balance of appropriation on hand, $38,354 53, would leave, say $23,000, which could be profitably expended during the next fiscal year. The recommendation is approved."

Then I turn to page 78, and, relating to the same appropriation, I find this:

"This extension is necessary; for the bar, though forming slowly, will in course of time obstruct the entrance if nothing be done to prevent it, and if the work be delayed it will cost more when it is done, because the bar will have to be dredged away, thus incurring an expense not necessary now."

I do not ask the House to appropriate any more than is called for by the engineers in order to finish this work. I only move to add $10,000, bringing the appropriation up to $25,000; and I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, who reported this bill, whether it is not reasonable?

Mr. ELIOT. I am bound to say in regard to this amendment that there was some error. From examination at the War Department I am satisfied it ought to be corrected. This, with other appropriations the gentleman will call attention to, are eminently sound and proper. This appropriation should be increased to $25,000. I hope, therefore, the amendment will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For improvement of Racine harbor, Wisconsin, $10,000.

Mr. PAINE. For the same reason I move to increase this $10,000, and make it $20,000.

I will say, so far as the harbor of Milwaukee is concerned, the city itself has expended nearly half a million dollars upon it. The city of Racine has also expended a large amount on this harbor. I shall move to increase the appropriation for Kenosha also. The engineer reports as follows:

"9. Harbor of Racine, Wisconsin.

"The plan for this harbor is to extend both piers, composed of cribs ballasted with stone, until a depth of fifteen feet of water is reached, and to dredge between the piers until twelve feet is obtained throughout.

"Due notice having been given, the bids were opened and contracts entered into for prolonging the north pier the required distance.

"The engineer in charge recommends dredging between the piers to a depth of fourteen feet. The estimated cost of this improvement was $84,172 48; the amount appropriated was $45,000; amount required to complete the work, $39,172 48; add for additional dredging, $5,000; amount which can be profitably expended during the next fiscal year, $45,000. The recommendation is approved.

"(See Appendix A, 8.)

"10. Harbor of Kenosha, Wisconsin.

"During the present season the contractors have extended the south pier three hundred and fifty-two feet, and will complete the extension of the north pier one hundred and ninety-two feet.

"A depth of twelve feet has been obtained throughout the greater part of the water-way, between the piers, by dredging. The old piers are in bad condition, and require rebuilding from the water surface. The basin inside is very shallow.

"The engineer in charge does not consider it necessary to extend the piers further at the present time, but thinks it proper to repair the old work and dredge the basin to the depth of ten feet; for which he estimates"—

For repairs of old pier work.....$20,000
For dredging required in basin..... 85,000

Total.....$105,000

Mr. ELIOT. The improvement of this harbor now contemplated can be found set out at length in the report, pages 75 and 76. These harbors are important not only for the purposes of commerce, but as harbors of refuge. The gentleman's amendment is in accordance with the estimates.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next clause, as follows:

For improvement of Kenesho harbor, Wisconsin, $10,000.

Mr. PAINE. I move to increase that to $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk next read the following clauses:

For improvement of harbor of Chicago, Illinois, $48,000.

For improvement of Michigan City harbor, Indiana, $35,000.

For improvement of harbor of St. Joseph, Michigan, $20,000.

For improvement of South Haven harbor, Michigan, $20,000.

For improvement of Grand Haven harbor, Michigan, $20,000.

For improvement of Muskegon harbor, Michigan, $10,000.

For improvement of White river harbor, Michigan, $75,000.

For improvement of Pentwater harbor, Michigan, $25,000.

For improvement of Pere Marquette harbor, Michigan, $20,000.

For improvement of Manistee harbor, Michigan, $25,000.

Mr. PILE. I find the last appropriation read is an increase on the estimates. I move to reduce it to $20,000, and I should like to know the reasons for the increase.

Mr. FERRY. Will the chairman of the committee allow me to reply to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PILE.]

Mr. ELIOT. Certainly.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri has moved to reduce the appropriation for Manistee harbor from $25,000 to $20,000, and asks why it has been increased above the amount recommended in the report. By reference to the annual report of the engineer department, to which I now call the attention of the gentleman, it will be seen that the amount originally recommended for that harbor was $60,000. With a view to bring the appropriations this year within the lowest possible limits, the House requested the chief of engineers to submit an estimate of the least amount that would be consistent with the preservation of the works, already commenced and partly finished. The response to this request was the supplemental estimate to which the gentleman refers. In this modified report, making a very large reduction from the original one, I most heartily concurred. The condition of our finances, the burdens of necessary taxation demanded a scrupulous regard for the most economical expenditure of the public funds compatible with the public interests.

To show the gentleman how far that disposition was regarded, and in which I most cheerfully cooperated, I call his attention to the fact that for the harbors in the district I represent the amount was reduced from $433,000 to $185,000, a reduction of $248,000; and it will be further seen how materially this operated on Manistee harbor, when the estimates for that were cut down to one-third the original amount recommended. That the gentleman and the House may appreciate how far I shared in that disposition to cut down appropriations to the lowest possible figures consistent with a wise regard to a just economy, let me instance the case of Grand Haven harbor, where I reside. The original estimate for this was $75,000, and mostly for the construction of a new north pier. Believing that we could get along without a north pier for the present as we had for the past, I recommended abandonment of that till we were better able to meet the necessary appropriation, and that only so much as was necessary to complete the existing south pier and fully protect that should be appropriated. Twenty thousand dollars only was therefore recommended for Grand Haven harbor, instead of $75,000.

Upon the same theory of a wise economy I urged an appropriation for Muskegon harbor, sufficient to protect the piers already built, but of such temporary character, largely of slabs, exposed to the fire of passing steamers, and $10,000 was recommended in the last estimate where none was deemed necessary in the first estimate. Knowing that any day fire or other elements might so injure or destroy existing piers there that the harbor might be seriously damaged, I could well urge something for that object—and it was true economy, too—since I had cheerfully acquiesced in cutting down my own harbor from $75,000 to $20,000.

It is for this reason, sir, that Muskegon harbor appears with $10,000 in the last estimate against nothing in the first one. Upon the same principle of a wise regard to the condition of the several harbors within my district, for similar reasons it was necessary to increase Manistee harbor from $20,000 to $25,000, as the bill appears. Bearing in mind that the original estimate for this harbor was $60,000, the gentleman ought not to complain if our laudable economy has reduced the appropriation there $35,000, even if he discovers that the $25,000 in the bill is actually $5,000 more than appears in the supplemental estimate. This $5,000 I urged for protection against the ravages of fire, and because I felt confident that $20,000 would not be enough to keep going the work already commenced, and give due protection to money already expended, and insure safety to the growing commerce of that river.

More than this, Mr. Speaker, without disparaging other points of like energy, I may freely say that this appropriation and more is due alike to the enterprise and merits of the citizens of Manistee. With an outlay and persistency which entitle them to all praise they have, until within a very short time, made all the improvements of that harbor at their own charges. It is but just to them that the Government should now come to their rescue and share the burden of this work. Of my own knowledge and observation do I speak when I say that the enterprise exhibited all along the western shore of Michigan in respect to improvement of harbors of refuge is worthy the consideration of the Government. Winds prevailing as they do from the westward the whole shipping of the chain of lakes are more or less exposed to that shore, and the magnitude of that commerce entitles, yea, demands aid to construct suitable harbors of refuge, and you cannot have too many such. Vessels that are annually stranded upon that shore speak louder than my feeble voice for what I am contending. I regret, Mr. Speaker, that the five-minutes' rule deprives me from saying what I would like to say on this question of protection to harbors and commerce and which the subject demands, but I trust the gentleman is answered and that he will no longer press his amendment.

Mr. PILE. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For improvement of harbor at Aux Bees Scies, Michigan, $10,000.

For improvement of Saugatuck harbor, Michigan, $30,000.

For improvement of the St. Mary's river, Michigan, $20,000.

For improvement of Au Sable river, Lake Huron, Michigan, $20,000.

For improvement of St. Clair flats, Lake St. Clair, $200,000.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I move, on behalf of the Committee on Commerce, to insert the following:

For improvement of the Sandusky river, Ohio, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKLAND. I move to insert the following:

For improvement of harbor at Port Clinton, Ohio, $10,000.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I know that is right.

Mr. ELIOT. I do not recognize the particular right of the gentleman from Illinois to say that this should go in.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Why not?

Mr. ELIOT. Because he has not charge of the bill.

Mr. BUCKLAND. I wish simply to say that this is a port where there was a survey made last year, but no appropriation was recommended by the committee. I offer it because I suppose my constituents expect me to do so. It is one of the lake ports between Sandusky and Toledo.

Mr. SPALDING. It is needed, also.

Mr. BUCKLAND. Yes, sir; and I think it is right and proper. I do not desire to make a speech on the subject.

Mr. EGGLESTON. The amendment that has just passed is for that improvement, and therefore I think it is unnecessary to add this $10,000.

Mr. BUCKLAND. My colleague is mistaken. The Sandusky river does not go to Port Clinton at all. It is at the mouth of the Portage river.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. ELIOT. I object to any amendment of this sort. The committee have endeavored in the appropriations of this bill to keep down the expenditures so far as practicable consistent with the interests that have been represented to them by petition through the House in the ordinary way, or by application at the committee-room by gentlemen interested in the subject of the bill. It will be manifest that the bill as it came from the committee would be loaded down so as to be too heavy to be borne if gentlemen upon the floor make amendments because of the interest they severally represent, and they are agreed to by the House. I cannot say what the merits or demerits of the appropriation asked for are, but I can say that so far as the committee's work has been done it has been their endeavor to study carefully all the improvements which have been reported and to recommend none unless they came supported by arguments from the War Department, by recommendation of the bureau of engineers, and by considerations which seemed to the committee proper to be taken into account in reporting the bill to the House. I cannot, therefore, consent without any examination of the matter in hand that the amendment should be made, and must ask the House to vote against it, because otherwise it is perfectly obvious that gentlemen all around would be desirous of inserting amendments for the interest of their special localities without having them acted upon in the committee.

The question was taken on Mr. BUCKLAND'S amendment, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I desire to ask the gentleman who has charge of this bill why the harbor of Toledo has been omitted in the appropriations made this year?

Mr. ELIOT. Certainly, the gentleman has a right to an answer on the floor of the House; he has had an answer in private.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. What question is before the House?

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. There is no last word pending.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Then I move to insert the following:

For harbor of Toledo, $30,000.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Let that go in.

Mr. ELIOT. I desire to oppose the amendment. My friend from Illinois says, "Let that go in." The truth is, the gentleman from Illinois is desirous that this bill shall be destroyed, and it is a part of his parliamentary tactics to endeavor to make the measure as odious as possible before the final vote is taken. Very good tactics, but when it is known as thoroughly as it is in the case of my friend the tactics are very apt to be harmless.

I will say to my friend from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] who has earnestly, assiduously, in season and out of season, pressed upon the committee the desirableness of inserting an appropriation for Toledo in this bill—who has, in fact, beset the committee behind and before, and laid his hands upon it in order to get that appropriation made—that this is the simple and plain reason why the committee have not done it. The appropriation which was made last year has not yet been expended. The appropriation is sufficient for the purpose for which it was then designed. Upon examining the harbor of Toledo report was made to us by the chief engineer that the importance of that harbor is so decided, and the interests of commerce that are connected with it are so great, that it is important before another appropriation shall be made that a more careful survey should be had and a more careful plan of improvement adopted, in order that when the work is done it shall be in accordance with the wants of the locality. That has not been done. As soon as it is done, there will be such a report made as will enable the committee to insert in a river and harbor bill a proper appropriation. Not having the proper information now, the committee could not do what my friend has desired.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Has there not been a report submitted to the committee by the War Department on the survey made last fall?

Mr. ELIOT. Well, sir, if the gentleman will examine the last report he will find that in the report itself are found the facts which I have stated, that it is important, in view of the importance of the harbor itself, that a further examination and further plans should be made of the improvements before they can be properly entered on.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. WELKER. I offer the following amendment:

For improvement of Black river harbor on Lake Erie, $20,000.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that I would be neglecting the interests of my constituents, representing, as I do, one of the districts bordering on the southern shore of Lake Erie, if I did not offer this amendment. I have in my district perhaps one of the best harbors on Lake Erie, that at the mouth of the Black river, and my colleague from Cleveland [Mr. SPALDING] will bear me out in saying that it is the only competing point for the navy-yard which we expect to get on the southern shore of Lake Erie. I am astonished that the Committee on Commerce have not seen the importance of this harbor and recommended an appropriation for its improvement. I do not know personally whether my constituents residing there want this appropriation or not, but I feel that, representing that district, as I do, I should ask at the hands of Congress, in this division or distribution of the public funds, an appropriation of $20,000.

Mr. UPSON. If this is such an excellent harbor why do you want money to improve it?

Mr. WELKER. To make it better. While all these harbors are being improved, I think my constituents have been very much slighted in not having an appropriation recommended for their benefit.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I understand the gentleman to say that he does not know whether his constituents want this appropriation or not.

Mr. WELKER. This is the only harbor I have in my district. Almost every other member has his appropriation in this bill, and I think my district should be also represented in this bill.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman seems to think that his district is entitled to at least this much in the general distribution of the public funds.

Mr. WELKER. I desire to say in further recommendation of this place that it is a growing town, and I would be glad to afford labor to persons there by the expenditure of public money to be appropriated by this bill. I would be exceedingly glad if Congress would make this appropriation, in order that my constituents, and the constituents of all the other members who have appropriations in this bill, may be employed during this summer. It not only would be a relief to them, but I have no doubt it would be of great advantage to me personally, if I could get this appropriation made. [Laughter.] I hope, therefore, no objection will be made to it.

Mr. ELIOT. I desire to say that I am glad, on account of the gentleman from Black river, [Mr. WELKER,] that his constituents have not a Representative upon this floor whose duty it has been to get up a river and harbor appropriation bill for presentation to this House. There have been more cases than I can remember, like unto this which the gentleman has spoken of, which have been brought before the Committee of Commerce for the purpose of seeing whether special localities might not for special reasons be accommodated with appropriations. I can only say to my friend that the uniform rule of the committee has been to exclude every application that has not rested upon survey, estimate, and recommendation from the War Department, and the object of which did not of itself possess intrinsic importance.

Sir, it will not do for us to expend the public money where only purely local matters are involved. And I take this occasion to say to the House that, in my judgment, there is not one single appropriation asked for in this bill where the interests of commerce as well as the interests of localities are not subserved.

Mr. WELKER. Do I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] to say that there has been no survey of Black river harbor? If he did say so, he certainly is mistaken. There was an appropriation made last year, as there was several years before; and it is about as notorious as any harbor on that lake.

Mr. ELIOT. Then the gentleman will find, if he will look a little further, that there is enough of the money already appropriated now on hand for all purposes that will be wanted during this year, and that at this time no appropriation is wanted for the point he has designated.

I could not tell, without having the books before me, what were the reasons why the committee did not insert an appropriation for this or that purpose, except the general reason that there is money enough on hand to carry the work reasonably forward until next year.

Some time ago a resolution was sent to the War Department directing it to revise and reduce the estimates for the works in preparation. In consequence of that resolution circulars were sent to the engineers throughout the country having charge of those works, and upon the reports received from them the estimates were revised and reduced, and appropriations in accordance with those estimates have been embraced in the bill now before the House. In some cases there have been appropriations omitted. And it may be, and probably is, that the locality referred to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELKER] is among those for which no appropriations are now wanted. I will state what he probably knows, that there are about ten thousand dollars of the appropriation for his locality still unexpended. I hope, therefore, he will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. WELKER. I cannot withdraw it.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. WELKER, and it was not agreed to; there being upon a division—ayes 45, noes 51.

Mr. SPALDING. In order to perfect this bill as much as I can I move to amend it by inserting the following:

For increasing the capacity of the ship-canal at Sault Ste. Marie, $50,000.

I offer this amendment in obedience to instructions from my constituents, a large number of whom have petitioned for an appropriation to increase the capacity of that canal.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I believe that canal is owned by a company, which was very richly endowed by the United States before the canal was built. The United States gave them a very large quantity of land, out of which, I believe, they have made large fortunes. And I believe they charge fees for transportation over this canal.

Mr. UPSON. I desire to correct the gentleman. This canal is not owned by a company, and no fees are charged, except what are necessary to keep it in repair. The lands donated by the Government were all given to secure the building of the canal.

Mr. PRUYN. I desire to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] that I was one of the unfortunate persons who was engaged in building this canal, and I can assure him that no money was made out of it. I desire to say, however, that it was the best operation of a public character that the United States ever entered into. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DRIGGS] has heretofore given to this House the facts in regard to that matter. The canal is now owned by the State of Michigan. No company has anything to do with it. It is the property of the State, and they levy toll enough to keep the canal in repair. That is the present condition of things. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be ready at the proper time with the appropriate legislation to afford that canal the relief to which it is entitled in consequence of the expenses of this public work over the receipts.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I judge from the character of the gentleman and his associates that they would not embark in a bad speculation.

Mr. PRUYN. The gentleman has been misinformed this time.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. Speaker, I am familiar with the facts in relation to this work. There was granted a large quantity of public land to the State of Michigan for the building of this canal. The State under the authority of the act of Congress created a company. The State itself has no interest in the work itself. It is the trustee for the Government of the United States. It has no right to levy any toll or to acquire any money whatever, any revenue from this work, except for the purpose of keeping it up in repair and paying expenses of keeping it up. It was limited to that.

I will say further that the State of Michigan has borrowed itself the sum of $100,000, which had to be laid out on this canal in addition to the appropriations made by the General Government to keep up this work. That is all the interest the State has in it.

I will add that the State of Michigan has no greater interest in this work than at least five or six other States which do business through it. It is a great national highway and needs improvement whether this is appropriated or not. The State of Michigan is simply the trustee for the Government. The company which made this work used up all the lands for that purpose.

Mr. DRIGGS. I move to make it $45,000. I hold in my hand a proposition for surveys and estimates preparatory to a report on this subject at the next session of Congress. I have had sent to me fifteen or twenty petitions covering nearly all the shipping interests of the lakes, of the ports in my own State and of other States interested in keeping up this work, and these petitions I have referred to the Committee on Commerce. That committee has reported the appropriations in this bill. I propose to offer an amendment to them.

The SPEAKER. It is not relevant.

Mr. RANDALL. As it is manifest we cannot finish this this afternoon, I move that we adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw the motion to adjourn until the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] can move his substitute for the bill which will test the sense of the House on this question.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. DRIGGS. The amendment I wish to propose is as follows:

Provided, That in addition to the foregoing surveys and estimates, the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, directed to cause surveys and estimates to be made for deepening and increasing the capacity of Sault Ste. Marie's ship-canal, in the State of Michigan.

Mr. DELANO. I now propose a substitute for the bill.

The SPEAKER. That must be reserved until the bill has been gone through.

Mr. DRIGGS. I will withdraw my amendment for the present.

Mr. DELANO. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Commerce, with instructions to report the substitute which I send to the Chair.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

Mr. ELIOT. I hope the House will allow me to be heard upon it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be entitled to five minutes in opposition to the motion.

The substitute of Mr. DELANO was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: That the following sums of money are hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, under the direction of the Secretary of War, for the repair and preservation of certain harbors and works already commenced, and for the improvement of certain rivers; that is to say:

For the improvement of harbors on our northern lakes and for the St. Clair flats, $500,000.

For the improvement of coast harbors, $150,000.

For the improvement of rivers, including Des Moines, Rock Island rapids, and Hell Gate, on East river, Wisconsin and Patapsco rivers, at the discretion of the Secretary of War, $1,300,000.

For the purpose of completing reports, maps, and diagrams on bridges on the Mississippi river, $3,000, and for purchase and repair of instruments, $1,000, and for the purpose of a survey for deepening the ship-canal at Sault Ste Marie, $1,000.

And be it further enacted, That all work done under the authority of this act shall be performed under contracts made by the Secretary of War, who shall prescribe suitable rules for the issuing of proposals for materials or labor, having regard to the most effective use of moneys appropriated: Provided, That separate proposals and contracts shall be required in all cases when the same can be, in the judgment of the Secretary, judiciously and properly made.

Mr. JENCKES. Does the Chair decide that this motion is in order before the bill is perfected?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so rules. This is a motion to recommit with instructions. The bill is being acted upon in the House as in Committee of the Whole, with the Speaker in the chair. It is being considered section by section under the rule allowing five minutes to debate pro and con. on amendments. If that limitation had not been adopted, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] might have demanded the previous question on the bill without considering it by clauses, allowing only one amendment and an amendment to the amendment. But as the rule in regard to amendments and debate in Committee of the Whole has been adopted by order of the House it is in order to move to recommit at any stage as it would also be to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Will the gentleman yield to allow me to offer an amendment to the instructions?

Mr. DELANO. I cannot yield. I desire to state that the substitute which I offer appropriates $2,000,000. It may vary a little from that amount. It appropriates for improvements of harbors on our northern lakes, at the discretion of the Secretary of War, without identifying or naming the places, $500,000, and for the improvement of rivers and harbors, especially naming the Des Moines rapids as among them, to be taken into consideration by the Secretary of War, $1,300,000. But I desire it to be understood that all these appropriations are left subject to the discretion of the Department.

In submitting this proposition we do just what Congress did during the prosecution of the war when they felt it was necessary that something should be done to preserve improvements in progress, and that all could not be done that might be necessary to satisfy the wishes of all parts of the country. The policy of making limited appropriations for the preservation of works in progress was adopted because the finances of the country demanded it and the condition of things required it. I propose to continue that policy now instead of entering upon this new policy proposed by the Committee on Commerce, and I do it for the reasons I have already suggested to the House. This nation is like a strong man who has been engaged in a conflict demanding all his resources, has passed through it and needs rest and repose; not inactivity, not total inaction, but recuperation. While we are drawing our breath to recover we propose to preserve such works as are in progress and make an appropriation of $2,000,000 for that purpose.

But I have not time to press the considerations in favor of this substitute. I desire the House to consider whether it is not better to take this policy now, and continue it till the nation has recovered its financial vitality and energy, so as to justify the entering upon a theory or practice of general improvements of our rivers and harbors. Now, sir, more I could say; but it is only the leading ideas that I wished to present to the House, and therefore I will say no more.

Mr. ELIOT. This is a most remarkable proposition. The Committee on Commerce, under the instructions of the House, have been engaged pretty earnestly and conscientiously for some months in preparing this bill. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] the chairman of the committee, when the report was made, submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which has been printed. We have it before us. To-day the House has been discussing the various provisions reported by the committee, and now the gentleman from Ohio—

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a point of order. I desire to know whether the gentleman has a right to adopt the speech which I made yesterday about months of hard labor and conscientious application to duty as reasons why his bill should prevail. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. He certainly has. Any gentleman has a right to adopt the remarks of another.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well, sir.

Mr. ELIOT. If I remember aright, I had heard that same speech from the gentleman before yesterday and on occasions when the House did pretty much the same thing as they did yesterday. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, the House understands this matter pretty well. I have these two great objections to make to this unprinted amendment, which is sprung upon the House with the concurrence of my friend from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] who had his substitute printed for the purpose of taking, it may be, strength from the bill reported by the committee. I have this to say concerning the unprinted bill. It appropriates $2,000,000 and turns that sum over very kindly to whoever may be Secretary of War to dispose of about as he shall think advisable; whether regularly in office or ad interim is of no consequence; he is to have the whole control of the disposition of this money, expending it here or expending it there, in this amount and in that amount, as his judgment shall dictate. The gentleman from Ohio distinctly, by his bill, gives the power to the Secretary of War. If he chooses to take the advice of the chief engineer he may do so. If he chooses to apply the money according to his own discretion, he may do so.

Then, too, there is a provision in this unprinted bill that all the work shall be done by contract, which, as it stands in the bill, is not only a vicious provision, but one that has been found to be hurtful to the public interests ever since it was first reported in a river and harbor bill two years ago. The difficulties of the system have been insuperable, and in the bill which the committee have this year reported to the House it has been very materially changed. I say that it would be hurtful to the country and not helpful to it.

If the House is prepared to instruct the Committee on Commerce to bring in such a bill as that we shall bow gracefully to their judgment. Personally it is a matter that does not concern me. I am rather working for the West than for the East, for all parts of the country, and I believe that the interests of the commerce of the country and of the revenues of the country demand that the bill as we have reported it should pass.

Mr. DELANO. I move to close all debate on the pending motion.

Mr. PILE. Will the gentleman yield to me to offer an amendment to the instructions?

Mr. DELANO. No, sir; we may as well take the vote on my motion.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BOYER: The petition of J. Wood & Brother, iron manufacturers, and of 46 iron-workers of Conshohocken, Pennsylvania, complaining of the depression of manufacturing industry, which affects disastrously every form of production and business, and praying for such increase of protective duties as will revive manufactures and restore prosperity to the country.

By Mr. COVODE: The petition of sundry citizens of Westmoreland and Alleghany counties, Pennsylvania, for reduction of whisky tax.

By Mr. CHANLER: The petition of John T. Conover, president of the Traders' and Mechanics' Association, Abraham J. Felter, and others, citizens of New York city, for an appropriation for the removal of rocks and other obstructions which impede the navigation of the East river entrance to New York harbor at Hell Gate, and for the removal of rocks in the harbor, known as Battery, Diamond, and Coenties reefs.

Also, the petition of Horatio Allen and others, for the same purpose.

Also, the petition of William Searls, president New York Stock Exchange, and other members thereof, for same purpose.

Also, the petition of A. W. Greenleaf and others, citizens of New York, for the same purpose.

By Mr. DODGE: The petition of citizens of Wayne county, Iowa, asking grant of lands to aid in constructing the Iowa and Missouri State Line railroad.

By Mr. McCARTHY: The petition from the cigar-makers of the State of New York, under the seal and signature of the president of the Cigar-makers' National Union, against alterations of the revenue laws as proposed in the bill now before Congress on the manufacture of cigars.

By Mr. MERCUR: The memorial of Grove Brothers and 84 others, manufacturers of iron, and workmen at Danville, Pennsylvania, complaining of want of efficient protection against the cheaper labor and capital of foreign countries, and praying for reconsideration of the tariff bill which failed in the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and that it may be enacted into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

By Mr. NICHOLSON: A memorial of W. Jones & Co. and others, morocco manufacturers of Wilmington, Delaware, complaining of the inadequacy of customs duties to protect the productive interests of the country against the cheaper labor and capital of foreign countries, and praying for the reconsideration and passage of the general tariff bill which failed in the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

By Mr. O'NEILL: The petition of Edward W. Miller, Edward Gaskill & Co., and 93 others, bookbinders in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, representing that the customs duties which were sufficient to invite the investment of capital and labor in manufactures have become inadequate, and, in prospect of a continued decline in gold, must shortly prove ruinous; that much of the distress now prevalent and increasing daily, would be relieved by the legislation suggested in the report of Special Commissioner Wells, and perfected in the tariff bill (as passed by the Senate) which failed in the House of Representatives March, 1867, for want of time, and praying that Congress will resume consideration of that measure and enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

Also, the petition of Charles Guenther and 42 others, lithographers, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, representing that the depression of the manufacturing industry of the country affects disastrously every form of production and business, and must reduce the revenues and endanger the credit of the Government; and praying for such increase of protective duties as will revive manufactures and restore prosperity to the country.

Also, a memorial of Wolfe & Co., Hampshire Paper Company, W. A. Wanhopp, Thomas C. Percival, William Shealds, George C. Ewing, Charles Spencer, and 97 other manufacturing companies and firms of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, complaining of the depression of industry caused by want of efficient protection to the labor of the country; and praying that Congress will resume consideration of the general tariff bill which failed in the Thirty-Ninth Congress for want of time, and enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

By Mr. PRICE: The petition of 266 citizens of the State of Iowa, asking for a grant of land to aid in the construction of the Iowa and Missouri State Line railroad.

By Mr. SPALDING: The petition of H. B. Tuttle and others, citizens of Cleveland, Ohio, for an appropriation by Congress for the improvement of the river and canal at the Sault Ste. Marie.

Also, a memorial of sundry citizens of Cleveland, Ohio, in regard to the tax on cigars.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, June 17, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. A. D. GILLETTE, D. D.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, communicating a draft of a proposed law relative to the judge advocates of the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from General Sheridan, commanding the department of Missouri, urging that the Central Pacific Railroad Company be required to extend their road from Atchison to Fort Leavenworth; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

RECONSTRUCTION LAWS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate resolutions of the constitutional convention of Texas, in favor of the transfer from the military commander of the fifth military district to that convention the power and authority to appoint and remove registrars for ascertaining and recording the qualified voters of that State.

Mr. DRAKE. I ask for the reading of the resolutions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, First, That in the opinion of this convention it is necessary in this State, to a fair administration of the laws of Congress upon the subject of the reconstruction of the States lately in rebellion, to so change the provisions of said laws as to transfer from the commander of the fifth military district to this convention the power and authority to appoint and to remove registrars for ascertaining and recording the qualified voters of the State of Texas.

"Resolved, Second, That this convention respectfully but earnestly urge upon the Congress of the United States the change indicated in the preceding resolution, at the earliest practicable moment.

"Resolved, Third, That the president of this convention transmit to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States copies of these resolutions."

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON. I present the petition of King & Baird, William A. Hand, Thomas Sinclair, and four hundred others, printers and book-binders of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, representing that the productive interests of the country are suffering and its industry paralyzed for the want of efficient protection against the cheaper labor and capital of foreign countries. They say that the customs duties, which, under a different condition of affairs, were sufficient to invite the investment of capital and labor in various branches of manufacture, and which subsequently, under a high gold premium, continued to foster them, have become at present inadequate, and, in prospect of a continued decline in gold, must shortly prove utterly insufficient. The manufacturing population cannot continue to pay prices for provisions, even approaching those now realized by agriculturists, while exposed to competition with the Old World under a tariff framed to meet exigencies of a totally different character. Nor will the removal of internal taxation, though vitally important, afford in itself the relief necessary. They declare, further, that much of the distress now prevalent, and daily increasing, would be relieved by the legislation suggested in Special Commissioner Wells's report of last year, and perfected in the tariff bill (as passed by the Senate) which failed in the House of Representatives in March, 1867, for the want of time. They therefore pray Congress to resume the consideration of that measure, and, with such modifications as its wisdom may suggest, to enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment. I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON presented a memorial of workmen and firms of the State of Pennsylvania, and a memorial of Horace S. Soule and others, manufacturing companies, firms, and business men of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, complaining of the insufficiency of the customs duties to protect domestic industry against the cheaper labor and capital of foreign countries, and praying for the reconsideration and passage of the general tariff bill which failed for want of time in the Thirty-Ninth Congress; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of F. B. Brown, Abram Suydam, and others, zinc and steel makers of Pennsylvania, complaining of the depression of industry, and praying for such increase of protective duties as will revive manufactures and restore prosperity to the country; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of workers in iron and coal and manufacturers of Pennsylvania, praying for such additional protective duties as will relieve their distress, secure a home market for the products of their industry, and aid them in the unequal contest with the underpaid labor of Europe; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SUMNER. I present a petition of merchants and shipowners of Boston, in which they represent that the action of the Executive and of Congress in 1823, in recognizing the independence of the South American republics, after they had established it as a fact, although never conceded by Spain, affords a just precedent for similar action on the part of our Government with reference to the war commenced by Spain in 1864 on the republics of Peru, Chili, and Ecuador, and which was prosecuted with more or less activity until May, 1866, but which these petitioners represent has now for upward of two years past entirely ceased, with no prospect of resumption. Therefore these petitioners submit that they have the right as citizens of the United States to deal with either of those Powers heretofore belligerent, or with their citizens or subjects, upon the same footing and to the same extent as if a formal treaty of peace had been ratified and exchanged; and they now address Congress and ask some action on their part to protect them in that asserted right of commerce. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VICKERS. I present a memorial of citizens of Baltimore, remonstrating against any reduction of the duty on coal. I move that this remonstrance be referred to the Committee on Finance; and as it contains many valuable facts in a brief space I move that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CATTELL presented a petition of citizens of Philadelphia and Cincinnati, praying an extension of the law allowing the free entry of steam-ploving machinery into the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask leave to present a petition. As it is short I will ask to have it read, that the Senate may be put in possession of its contents, and then it can be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary to make inquiry into the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the reading of the petition? No objection being made it will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Your petitioner, William S. Chipley, respectfully states that he is a citizen of the United States, and a resident of the city of Lexington, in the State of Kentucky. That he is the father of William Dudley Chipley, a citizen of Columbus, Georgia, who has been arrested and imprisoned by order of the military authorities of the United States without cause and in disregard of the provision of the Constitution of the United States, and carried out of the district in which any offense charged against him was committed to Atlanta, Georgia, some two hundred miles distant from his home, and is now confined there in a cell which is wholly unfit for the confinement, even as punishment, of a condemned criminal. He is denied the privilege of seeing or consulting with either his family, his friends, or his counsel, and deprived of all information as to the nature of the charge against him, without power to summon or procure the attendance of witnesses in his defense. In short, he is utterly at the mercy of his persecutors, and denied every right which the Constitution and laws secure to the citizen. He is not, and has not been, either in the naval nor military service of the United States. He is a commission merchant in Columbus, a married man, and a good citizen, as all who know him will testify. Your petitioner does not know certainly what the charges against his son are, and can only surmise, from the statements of discharged negro witnesses who were arrested, confined, and examined touching his connection therewith, that he is imprisoned for complicity in the murder of one G. W. Ashburn, who was killed in a house of ill-fame.

Mr. HOWE. That communication seems to me a very lengthy one, and it is from a private citizen I understand. If it calls for any action at all I suppose the Judiciary Committee can tell us what action it calls for. I therefore move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection to that course. I desired it to be read merely that it should attract the attention of the Senate, so as to draw the consideration of the Senate to it. I move that the petition, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the bill (H. R. No. 970) to provide for a temporary and provisional government for Alabama; the bill (S. No. 348) declaring the State of Alabama restored to the right of representation in Congress; the bill (S. No. 463) to provide for a temporary and provisional government for Alabama, and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 112) to restore Alabama to representation in Congress, to report the same back adversely, because the subject has already been acted upon; and I move to take them off the Calendar that they be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred resolutions adopted at a meeting of Republicans held in Dennopolis, Alabama, in favor of the passage of an act declaring the constitution of that State ratified; a memorial of citizens of Jones, Fayette, and Warren counties, Alabama, praying Congress to pass a law setting aside and declaring null and void the ordinance of the late convention of that State; and a petition of Rufus Andrews, of New York, inclosing petition relative to the clause in the Alabama constitution concerning wharfage, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, who were, by a resolution of the Senate of February 12, instructed to inquire into the facts connected with the forcible ejection from the cars of the Alexandria and Washington railroad of one of the employes of the Senate on account of race, on Saturday, February 8, 1868, and to inquire what legislation, if any, is necessary to protect the rights of passengers on that road, submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. YATES, from the Committee on Territories, submitted an additional report to accompany the bill (S. No. 11) to admit the State of Colorado into the Union; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 526) to amend an act incorporating the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 480) in relation to the pay of grand and petit jurors in the District of Columbia, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 96) for the relief of John Sedgwick, collector of internal revenue third district California, reported it without amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 347) to amend an act to divide the State of Illinois into two judicial districts, approved February 13, 1855, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of Miss G. C. Smith, asking an amendment of the bankrupt law so that her mother will not be deprived of the amount of property allowed an insolvent; three petitions of citizens of Illinois, praying the establishment of two annual terms of the United States circuit and district courts at Quincy, Illinois; the resolutions of the constitutional convention of Virginia, in favor of extending the period during which the first clause of the bankrupt act shall operate; a memorial of citizens of New York city, remonstrating against any extension of the time limited in the law for commencing proceedings in bankruptcy; a memorial of citizens of Boston, in relation to bankruptcy; and two memorials of citizens of New York, in relation to bankruptcy, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1021) in amendment of an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867; the bill (S. No. 401) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," and a joint resolution (S. R. No. 142) to refer the claim of George Choppening and former act of Congress for his relief to the Court of Claims, reported adversely thereon, and recommended their indefinite postponement.

SALE OF HAY IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 540) to regulate the sale of hay in the District of Columbia, have had it under consideration, and have directed me to report the bill favorably and to ask action upon it at this time. It will take but a moment.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that all hay and straw which may be sold by weight in the District of Columbia shall be sold by the net hundred, and every two thousand pounds net weight shall be a ton.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I am also directed by the same committee to report back two other bills on the same subject, and to move that they be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 271) to regulate the sale of hay and straw in the District of Columbia, and the bill (S. No. 461) to regulate the sale of hay in the District of Columbia, were postponed indefinitely.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 143) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to remit the duties on certain religious books donated to the people of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 149) authorizing the sale of damaged or unserviceable arms, ordnance, or ordnance stores; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

RETURN OF A BILL.

Mr. FERRY. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill to amend the act of March 3, 1865, providing for the construction of certain wagon-roads in Dakota Territory, being House bill No. 650.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, the bill referred to by the resolution came from the House of Representatives, and was amended in the Senate owing to a mistake made by the Secretary of the Interior in a communication forwarded to the Committee on Territories, from which the bill was reported. That mistake having been corrected, it is desirable to get back the bill in order to correct the bill itself.

The resolution was adopted.

JONATHAN JESSUP.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 867.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the title of it?

Mr. RAMSEY. "A bill for the relief of Jonathan Jessup, postmaster at York, Pennsylvania."

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post Office Department to allow Jonathan Jessup, of York, Pennsylvania, the sum of $1,807 36, in the auditing of his accounts for the fiscal year of 1867.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANDREW S. CORE.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the Senate take up for consideration Senate bill No. 522, reported from the Committee on Finance. It is a bill of only five lines, and will not lead to any discussion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the title of it?

Mr. VAN WINKLE. "A bill to authorize the Commissioner of the Revenue to settle the accounts of Andrew S. Core." The circumstances are such that a settlement cannot be made without this authority.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Commissioner of the Revenue to settle and close the accounts of Andrew S. Core, late collector of internal revenue for the second district of Virginia, (now West Virginia,) upon principles of justice and equity.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 440) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864.

The pending question was stated to be on the motion of Mr. CAMERON, to amend the bill by striking out the first section, in the following words:

That it shall be unlawful for national banks located in the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, or any of the cities named in section thirty-one of an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, to pay interest on the deposits or balances of any other national banking association, or to offer any inducement, other than the prompt and correct transaction of business, in order to secure such deposits; and it is hereby made the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency to see that this act is observed; and upon a violation thereof by any national banking association, he is hereby authorized and required to proceed, as in other cases of default, to appoint a receiver to wind up the affairs of such association according to the provisions of section fifty of said act.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I do not think it necessary to occupy the time of the Senate in discussion this morning, because the simple question now pending is between the country banks and the city banks. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CATTELL] spent half an hour or an hour yesterday on the principles of banking. The general principles which he laid down were pretty correct; but the principal matter, the marrow of this case, he did not touch at all. I have said from the beginning that this is a bill gotten up for the purpose of using the funds of the country banks without paying them for them. It is very natural, perhaps, that gentlemen situated as he is, representing banking corporations in the cities, should desire to get all the funds of the country possible without paying for them. The country banks do not send their deposits to the cities for the purpose of speculating, but they are compelled to send them there. In the first place, they are compelled by the banking law to keep a reserve fund there, and then in the course of trade their funds go there as a matter of course. They now get a small interest while they are there, and they suffer them to remain there only when they cannot be used at home. It is fair that they should be allowed to receive compensation for that use. On the other hand, the city banks are the great speculators.

Every crisis which has broken up the banks of the country has begun with the city banks on account of their speculations in stocks, the facilities they have for loaning their money by the day or by the hour, as they often do, at a large rate of interest. The country banks have no such temptation. A large portion of the year they need all their funds at home, and their customers and their stockholders would compel them to use them there if they were otherwise inclined. It is only when their capital is of necessity in the possession of the city banks that it is proposed that the city banks should pay them for the use of it.

This whole subject of banking is one which is so much talked about that we generally lose sight of the main matter of a bill when anything comes up connected with it. The old banking system was a good one in its day. The early banking system of this country, which has been so much abused, was one of the most important schemes ever invented for a new country like ours. We had a rich soil; we had a vigorous people; we had an extended country; but we had no capital. The original country banks got their life from an act of incorporation which generally included within its machinery the best men of the community. These men together staked their character and their property, and they issued their notes which passed as money. That did very well until the country became rich, and then the system, as a matter of course, fell down from its own weight.

I remember very well when I had charge of a little bank with $100,000 capital, and we had an average circulation of $700,000, and we never failed to meet our notes, and nobody ever doubted that we could meet them. So long as we did so they were just as good as money. The old system broke down, as I say, because the country became rich and the banks accumulated and men became speculators outside of the banks and broke them down. The New York system of banking, which was the next one, was better than the old system of banking, and much better than the system we have now. That system made circulation perfectly secure, because the stocks of New York and the stocks of the General Government were the basis of it, and under that system everybody that desired to bank might bank.

We shall some day come to that and have a general free-banking system based on our Government loans, and then every man who desires to bank will do so, and when he finds it unprofitable he will quit it. That is the system you will ultimately come to, and such discussions as we had yesterday and the day before will bring us to it sooner, because there is now a desire and a competition all over the country to get banks, as if having banks in a particular quarter made money plenty there. It is not so. You might just as well say that you should have a mint to coin your gold in every county or in every State of the Union. Money is an element of trade, which flows where it is wanted; and after it has been used and done its duty in a particular quarter it goes back to the centers of trade. It is just like the water flowing to the ocean and again reaching the clouds and coming down to us. We do not reflect upon the working of this machinery, but we all seem to have a special knowledge of banking.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CATTELL] read yesterday from the Comptroller of the Currency a very learned report, which he copied from some reports published in England and France; but they were all statements of general principles that had nothing to do with the question before us. It is, I repeat, simply whether you shall allow these banks to manage their business in their own way as shall seem to them best, relying on their integrity and their intelligence to preserve their own credit, and thus preserve the interests of the public, or whether you will compel them to throw their money into the city banks, where speculators may use it in inflating stocks, and producing a system of gambling which prevents men from following the regular pursuits of industry.

As I said, I do not desire to trouble the Senate, and I will not. I should have preferred to postpone this subject until the next session, because then I think the country will be in a condition when we may legislate wisely and well in regard to currency and finance; but if it be the pleasure of the Senate to act on the bill I think the first section should be stricken out.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to strike out the first section.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope this first section will be stricken out. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CATTELL] alluded yesterday to the large amount of money which the country banks were obliged to hold in their vaults or upon deposit in the eastern cities; in other words, a reserve which he said they were not permitted to work up. But, sir, the Senator from New Jersey has himself introduced a bill authorizing the issue of three per cent. certificates intended to be held as that very reserve, and to bring that reserve into an interest-bearing shape.

The Senator says that the country banks are compelled to hold fifteen per cent. of the whole amount of their capital and deposits on hand in lawful money, and the depository banks twenty-five per cent.

Mr. CATTELL. The Senator from Michigan misunderstood me. I said fifteen per cent. of their circulation and deposits, not of their capital and deposits.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is true. The depository banks are compelled to hold twenty-five per cent. of their circulation and deposits on hand at all times, and the western banks are permitted to have a portion of their reserve of fifteen per cent. on deposit in the large cities. Now, the Senator says that it will be much safer if these reserves are not upon interest. Will the Senator explain to me how and why it is safer that the self-same bank should hold these deposits and pay no interest on them than that it should hold them and pay an interest of four per cent.?

Mr. CATTELL. Does the Senator want an answer?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, sir; I should like to hear the answer.

Mr. CATTELL. I can give it in a single word. There is an inducement to pile up money in the city of New York, by the payment of interest, which ought to be kept at home.

Mr. CHANDLER. I shall come to that directly, and the answer to that will be a part of my argument. The Senator alluded to that point yesterday. The law compels these western banks to deposit in the national banks in the cities which are Government depositories. Hence the deposit must remain in the self-same hands, whether interest be paid or be not paid under the law. Now, the Senator says that if no interest be paid these funds will be retained and held at home, instead of being deposited in the national depositories in the great cities. Sir, the Senator has been too long a banker to make that statement intending it. I tried to explain yesterday, and I will try to explain again to-day, so that he may comprehend it, that the western banks, and the eastern banks outside the large cities, make nearly all their redemptions by draft upon those large cities. In the cities of the West, even in specie-paying times, more than nine tenths of all their redemptions were made by draft on New York; and to-day a bank that cannot draw upon New York might as well shut up shop. The effect would be the same upon its credit that a refusal to pay specie would be upon a bank in specie-paying times. They must draw upon New York when the demand is made.

My statement yesterday was, or was intended to be, that a bank of $100,000 circulation almost anywhere would have $100,000 in deposits, and the average in the report before me shows that I rather understated it. Here, then, is a liability of $200,000 liable to be called upon at any moment. I stated that it was absolutely necessary for the safety of that bank, no matter where located, in any country town throughout the whole length and breadth of this land, to keep an average deposit of not less than $50,000 in some one of the large cities to draw upon; and whether you pay interest or do not pay interest will neither increase nor diminish it a single half dollar. The bank must be ready to meet its liabilities, and it must meet them in that way; and if it has not exchange on New York it must still draw and instantly express the bills to meet the draft when it arrives.

The city banks are willing and anxious to obtain these deposits at four per cent. Why? Because whatever the fund may be which they have over on any given day, they can loan it, not at four per cent., which they pay, but at six or seven per cent., and sometimes even at a higher rate of interest. Whether they pay four per cent. or nothing they will loan it to the very last dollar they have on hand, daily as they do now. The intent and meaning of this section is that they shall be enabled to pocket, not the residuum over four per cent., but the whole six or seven or eight per cent., whatever the amount may be that they obtain from day to day for their excess.

It is a mistake to suppose that this will change the amount of these deposits. There is not a bank throughout the West that does not receive more than double the amount of interest it receives on its deposits in the great cities. In Cincinnati the average rate of bank interest is not less than ten per cent., as I am informed; in Detroit about that; in Chicago twelve per cent.—three times the amount they receive. Do you suppose a bank in Chicago would deposit its funds in New York at four per cent. when it could get twelve per cent. at home? Certainly not. As I said before, it will not make the difference of a single half dollar in the amount they deposit, whether they receive four per cent. interest or no interest at all. There is not a bank in a single State, even including the New England States, which will not be seriously injured by the passage of this first section. Neither will it affect the amount of circulating medium at home. This is the argument that has been used in both Houses: "Withdraw your interest and the banks will keep their money at home and use it there." Why, sir, what use have they for it? As I said yesterday, I asked the cashier of the largest bank in the city in which I live what amount of redemption he had been called upon for in the three years the bank had been in existence, and he told me a single ten dollar bill. A man stepped in and told him he would like a greenback for a ten dollar bill, and he gave it to him; and that was all the redemption he was called upon for in three long years.

But, sir, day after day they are called upon for vast sums in redemption by drafts from the large cities. The city banks can well afford to pay these drafts, for they know almost to a certainty the amount which they will have on deposit at a given day. One section draws largely to-day, and another section largely to-morrow. One section draws in the spring and another in the fall. Drafts are made largely for the wool crop or the wheat crop. As I showed yesterday, and I have the figures before me, the average amount which they are compelled to keep in New York, and will keep in these large cities and will be compelled to keep, whether you pay interest or not, is something over seventy-three million dollars. Now, sir, I can well understand, and so can you, why the banks and bankers in the cities of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia should desire to have these vast deposits without paying any interest at all in order to swell their own dividends; but it would be an injustice, not only to every bank and banker, but to individuals. In the city in which I live the banks pay to their depositors for trust funds and court funds and funds that are to remain a long time on deposit, the precise sum which they receive for their balances in New York. It is their custom. Cut off this interest on the balances, and you cut off the interest that is paid to widows and orphans and trust funds and all other funds throughout the United States.

I intended no disrespect to the Senator from New Jersey yesterday when I said that this bill ought to be designated "A bill to enable a few bankers in the large cities to swindle the people of the United States in order to swell their own profits;" for that is exactly what this bill will do if you pass it. But, sir, if this section is not stricken out, I shall then offer my amendment prohibiting these banks that now desire to be relieved from paying any interest from loaning a single dollar on their deposits, and I hope the Senate will adopt that amendment, and then these men will be more anxious to defeat this section than I am now.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I do not intend to make a speech on this question, but I do wish that Senators would understand the exact condition in which the business of the country will be placed by the section under discussion if it is permitted to stand as law. I may be in error as to my judgment of the effect of this section, but it strikes me that the moment the banks are called upon to have a reserve in the event of this section passing it will be to that extent a curtailment of the currency. You will not certainly compel any of these country banks to make their deposits in a city bank unless there is security of some kind or compensation for it. Why will you ask a country bank to deposit in a New York bank any amount for the redemption of its circulation? Why not permit those banks to hold the amount in their own vaults for the redemption of their own currency? That, I understand, is the measure which the Senator from Michigan proposes.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will pardon me for one moment, the present law compels the banks to redeem in the large cities as well as at home. That is the law now.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Of course there is manifest injustice in compelling a reserve to be kept in a bank in New York by a bank in Michigan without compensation, because for this currency the bank in Michigan has made payment. The result, then, will be that this reserve fund will in effect be withdrawn from the business of the country into the country banks, and to that extent the bank capital upon which the business of the country is now being carried on will be restricted. That is my judgment in the matter, that the effect will be that if there is $60,000,000 now as a reserve you will permit the country banks to hold that amount in lawful money of the United States for the purpose of making their redemptions or redeeming their bills, and to that amount there will be a contraction of the banking facilities of the United States. If I am not correct in this I wish to be made so.

Mr. President, if I could make my views as plain as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] did his the other day, it would be exceedingly gratifying to me; or if I could make myself as well understood as the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON], who disclaims all knowledge of finance and of banking, it would be exceedingly gratifying to me. I wish there were more such men in this body who knew nothing of banking, but who would bring to the consideration of these questions the ordinary common judgment necessary to all practical questions. It has been my judgment from the beginning of the discussion of this question that the bankers of this country have "run the machine." The bankers of this country have had the manipulation of everything connected with the finances of the country, both in the Finance Committees in the Senate and House, at the Treasury, and with the President of the United States. In my judgment, all and each of these positions is susceptible of the clearest proof.

I will state for the information of the Senate, and it is undoubtedly within the knowledge of every one who hears me, that from the foundation of the banking principle of Great Britain, by which she has been able to carry a great debt two hundred years and more, she has repudiated the counsels of bankers from that time to this, and there is not one to-day who gives her counsel and advice in the management of her finances. It is a matter of history that the Bank of England in its yearly organization has ever refused admittance to its board to those engaged simply in the manipulation of money and making money upon money. It is a significant fact, and history has shown it to be true, that where men are engaged in any pursuit as a business they are unfit to take a wide view of all the conditions of the people and of the people's interests.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator suspend his remarks?

RECEPTION OF THE CHINESE EMBASSY.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the main entrance of the Senate Chamber at one o'clock, and announced the presence of the committee of the Senate and the Chinese embassy.

The members of the embassy, escorted by the committee of the Senate, Messrs. SUMNER, SHERMAN, and HENDRICKS, advanced within the bar, the Senators rising and standing till the members of the embassy were seated. The committee and the embassy having reached the area in front of the Secretary's desk,

Mr. SUMNER, on behalf of the committee, said: Mr. President, I present Mr. Burlingame and his associates of the Chinese embassy to the Senate of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I welcome Mr. Burlingame and his associates of the Chinese embassy to the Senate of the United States. The committee will conduct them to the seats prepared for them.

Mr. Burlingame and his associates of the Chinese embassy were conducted to seats provided for them in the area in front of the Secretary's desk.

The distinguished visitors having been seated,

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I move that business be suspended for twenty minutes, in order that Senators may have an opportunity to pay their respects individually to our distinguished guests.

The motion was agreed to unanimously.

The President pro tempore vacated the chair, and he and the other members of the Senate were severally introduced to the dignitaries of the embassy by the committee.

The recess having expired, the embassy left the Senate Chamber, escorted by the committee, and the Senate resumed its business.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1275) relating to the Alexandria canal, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

AFFAIRS IN TEXAS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate a telegraphic dispatch which has just been received from the constitutional convention of Texas, with an earnest request that it be immediately laid before the Senate. If there be no objection it will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

AUSTIN, TEXAS, June 16, 1868.

I am directed by the Texas convention to forward you the following resolutions adopted this day, duly attested copies of which will be sent you by mail. The immediate action of Congress is earnestly requested by the loyal people of this State:

Whereas lawlessness and crime exist to such an alarming extent in portions of this State, it is deemed proper to do all in the power of this convention to protect life and property, and for the suppression of crime: Therefore,

1. Be it resolved, That this convention respectfully urge upon the Congress of the United States the necessity of authorizing the organization by the body of a military force in the several counties in this State, to act in conjunction with and under the direction of the military commander therein, for the protection of the lives and property of the citizens now every day being preyed upon by assassins and robbers to an extent unparalleled in the history of civilized communities in times of peace, and which, if not speedily arrested, must result in the destruction of social order.

2. Resolved, That if protection is not speedily provided in some form by the national Government to the loyal and law-abiding citizens of Texas they will be compelled, in the exercise of the sacred right of self-defense, to organize for their own protection.

3. Resolved, That this convention have full confidence in Brevet Major General J. J. Reynolds, commander of the district of Texas, and that to the extent of the means placed at his disposal he will give protection and preserve peace.

E. J. DAVIS,
President Convention.

Hon. B. F. WADE,
President of the United States Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What order will the Senate take?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1275) relating to the Alexandria canal, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

NATIONAL BANKS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. No. 440) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] to strike out the first section of the bill, and on this question the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. SPRAGUE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I venture to suggest, Mr. President, that this day after one o'clock was set apart by special resolution for the consideration of bills from the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is true; but that order is superseded by the unfinished business of yesterday according to our rules, and it will require a motion to take up the pension bills.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope the honorable Senator from West Virginia will not interpose his motion until the honorable Senator from Rhode Island shall have concluded the remarks in the midst of which he was found when one o'clock arrived.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I shall not call for the regular order until the close of his remarks.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Mr. President, I stated it as my belief that the provision of this bill as reported from the Committee on Finance would in effect contract the currency to the amount of the reserve, because it would be manifestly unjust to require a country bank to keep a deposit to redeem its bills at any other place than its own counter; and if that amount was kept in its own vaults it would, to the extent of that amount, be a curtailing of the capital now employed in the business of the country, for the reason that the deposits which are now made to redeem the circulation of these national banks are employed, not perhaps in the business operations of the country, but in the business of bankers; and if they do not have this amount with which to do their banking they will withdraw from the ordinary business of the country an amount equivalent to it. I hope I have been able to make myself understood. I believe that will be the practical result of the operation.

Mr. President, it is immaterial to the business interests of this country what legislation you pass, how much you may agitate matters of finance, when you arrive at the condition when a dollar in paper is equal to a dollar in gold. When that time comes I will unite with the Senator from Ohio and vote for as many hundreds of millions of circulation as you can count in a day, to be given to anybody that will purchase and deposit United States bonds as security for its payment; and I have no doubt that the Senator from Vermont will unite with me in that proposition. The circulation of Rhode Island, now $13,000,000 of national currency, would in that event not amount, in my judgment, to more than two or three million dollars. It would, in fact, go back to the old condition of things when we in New England could hardly keep in circulation more than ten or fifteen per cent. of our capital.

Sir, I should not be doing justice to or properly representing my constituency did I not raise my voice in protest against the act of the Senate of yesterday, when, in my judgment, a solemn contract was violated. I remember well in the beginning of this war when the people of my State, in common with the people of the whole country, were called upon to defend the flag and to sustain the institutions of the country. I remember well the difficulty that existed in obtaining money to carry on the war. I remember well the scheme that was put out by the then Secretary of the Treasury to capture and sequester and obtain possession of the banking capital of the country. I remember well the proposition that he made with a view to that end, which is the present national banking system of the country. Senators must not forget that the national banking system of this country has performed that part in establishing this Government which contributes money for the payment of your soldiery and for the purchase of your supplies. You took from Rhode Island every dollar, or nearly every dollar, that is now represented by the national banking capital there, and instead of our former system we now have the national system. Was that interest ours then? Did that belong to the people of that State, or did it belong to the national Government to do with it as it pleased? It was thought by the people of that State that that interest was their own, and that they contributed it to the Government of the United States for the purpose of carrying on the war, and took in lieu of it that which they now possess, and which by yesterday's vote you propose to deprive them of.

I hope, sir, that it will not be in my time that the people of this country will again be called upon to defend the flag of the nation. If they shall be, I have no doubt that they will respond as they have done before; but I hope that those who are then the leaders of the people will forget this instance of breach of contract so that in that time when a solemn obligation is entered into the people of that day will believe that it will be sacredly and fully carried out. I have no regret to express on this point, except in that view of the case, in regard to which my regret is as great as I have words to express it. My judgment is that this is but the beginning of the end, and that the people of Rhode Island and the rest of New England, and all those who have taken so much of your national securities, had better take warning and alarm at this exhibition of ingratitude and injustice. We have taken our full share of the national securities, and now the sooner we dispose of them the better, it would seem from this action.

If I had my way, I would suspend all further agitation of the question of finance during the year. Our business operations are now carried on upon the basis of paper thirty or forty per cent. below par. Every variation from that, whether it be thirty-five or forty-five, and every agitation of the question, affects prices, affects enterprise, affects the operations of business and the labor of the country to that extent. There is no interest, unless it may be the agricultural interest, for the time being, that is in any way affected favorably by the present condition of things, unless the banking interest. The latter are able at once to change their securities, whereas men engaged in permanent business, who are obliged to make their investments for a year in advance, are unable to conform themselves and are unable to conform their business operations to the changing system of legislation. I venture to express the wish that all measures relating to the finances of the country be suspended for this year, and I have viewed with satisfaction the several motions made to lay this bill on the table. I did so from this fact, which I think will strike every Senator with favor when it is considered: that the honorable Senator from Ohio is advocating the policy of increasing the circulation, and the late chairman of the Committee on Finance is advocating a policy of contraction, two leading minds in this body have opposite and contrary views. In my judgment, the views of both are erroneous. The past year, ending the 31st of December last, considering the amount of business that was done by the people of the country, was, perhaps, the most disastrous of any year in our history. It was brought about by that system of contraction the Senator from Maine advocates so strenuously.

If we had a standard value upon which to carry on our business, and that value was recognized by the world, there would be ample banking facilities for all the purposes of legitimate business. It is not for the want of banking capital that the West is in such a condition to-day as to demand an increase of circulation, but it is in consequence of the character of that banking; it is in consequence of the material that is used, or that we are obliged to use, in carrying on the business of the country, that every withdrawal of it or any increase of its quantity affects injuriously all interests. There must be steadiness and permanency somewhere in every business operation; and whatever tends to disturb and unsettle is injurious.

The policy of the Senator from Ohio would be to increase the issues of the national currency; he would send a larger quantity of the national currency into the market, which would in effect practically tend to a greater depreciation, because there is more of it than can be used legitimately or than will be used legitimately in the practical business of life. This course adds to the already large sums collected in the various cities for the purposes of stock operations.

The Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Michigan desire more banking capital or currency for their States, and the Senator from Kentucky has succeeded in withdrawing that amount from Rhode Island. There is not a bank in Rhode Island that loans its money in any other way than to carry on some factory or other. The result of the action taken by the Senate is of course that these institutions must find capital in some other quarter for the purpose of carrying on their business. But, sir, it is a remarkable fact that Rhode Island, in carrying on her business, is constantly and almost invariably obliged to go into the New York market for the purpose of procuring circulation with which to pay her labor. Our present bank bills are not in fact or in effect circulation; they do not go back to the banks that issue them; they remain in the hands of those who collect them for purposes of speculation, and are readily bought by the banks for their customers to be used by those customers in paying for the labor they employ. Kentucky and Michigan, therefore, will come to the various centers of money if they want this circulation, and will buy it as we in Rhode Island buy ours. All that will be obtained by this movement will be a little more interest as a compensation for the amount that is withdrawn; the sum withdrawn from Rhode Island and Massachusetts and Connecticut will be given to Michigan and Kentucky and other States, and they will derive nothing but the interest on that amount. They will be curtailing the operations of the manufacturers in New England, and will do themselves no good; they will not build up one institution of that character in their States, and this money will be used either to keep up or depreciate the price of stocks.

A proposition made here to debase the coin of the country would be looked upon by every reasonable mind with dissatisfaction and with disgust; but a proposition to issue a dollar in currency, which requires eventual payment of a dollar in gold, is to that extent a debasement of the currency. You issue a debased currency when you issue any paper not based upon a settled, known, understood value; and that value must be a standard value, and gold is the only standard value. Whenever, therefore, you issue an additional amount of currency, if currency is not based upon the gold standard, you in effect debase your coin in another form. One is paper, the other is gold; each is valuable only as it represents value. A dollar in paper is equally as good as a dollar in gold if it has a value equal to it, and not otherwise. The policy of the Senator from Ohio asks you to issue and the country to receive more of this debased, this changeable currency and value.

I did not mean when I rose to make any extended remarks on this question; but believing that all these financial schemes are simply advocated in the interests of men engaged in manipulating money affairs, and believing that they are in no wise called for by any interest of the country, I could not hesitate to express, though feebly, my disapprobation of everything tending to legislation in the direction indicated by the measures that are before the Senate and before Congress. There can be no safe course except that which tends toward specie payments, as all admit. An increase of this currency puts that off. Restricting the amount of this currency bankrupts your business. Both of these policies, therefore, are wrong. The only sure course to pursue is to increase the value of your securities. They are now depreciated; they are not worth what they purport to be; and until you can create for them a value equal to that which they purport to bear upon their face you can never arrive at specie payments; you can never arrive at a settled condition of business operations in the country; you can never furnish a safe road out of your dilemma. I shall vote for the proposition of the Senator from Michigan, and I trust I shall have an opportunity after that to vote to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I shall vote for the proposition to strike out the first section of this bill. In doing so, it is proper for me to say that I was very much impressed by the able argument of the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. CATTELL.] Some portions of his argument I agree with. I doubt very much whether it is a safe system of banking that one bank shall pay to another interest on deposits; but I think that is a matter that ought to be regulated by the interest of business and commerce itself. I understand there are just two cases to be provided for by this section. In the first place, the banks of the interior are compelled by the banking law to keep on deposit in certain cities a portion of their capital.

Mr. SHERMAN. They are not compelled; they are authorized.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Well, they are required by the nature of the business. They are required to be prepared to redeem their bills at certain points; and to comply with that requisition as a matter of course they must have funds at some one of the specified points to meet any demand for redemption.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say to the Senator from Indiana that, practically, now the redemption of the national banking currency is merely nominal. One hundred dollars in any bank in New York will redeem all the circulation of any country bank that may be presented.

Mr. CAMERON. I hope the Senator from Indiana will let me say just one word. There is no practical difficulty now; but when we come to pay specie then the redemption becomes imperative. The necessity for all interior banks is to redeem their notes at the commercial centers, Philadelphia and New York. Now, they settle by checks and transferring accounts; but when we come to specie payments they must redeem their notes. We must look to that, because this law will act in the future as well as the present.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I am speaking of the necessity that the law, in my judgment, places upon the banks. Take a bank in the central portion of the State of Indiana, for instance. It is required to be prepared to redeem its bills at some one of the points mentioned in the law. Just to-day perhaps redemptions are not required, not called for; but there may come a time, and not far distant, when the redemptions will be required. The bank must be prepared to meet them. Now, as the law stands, whenever redemptions do arise, the bank must be ready to meet them whenever they are called for. Therefore, the law contemplates that the banks shall be prepared to meet any demand of this sort. To do so, they ought to have means on deposit at some one of these points. Why not allow them interest upon those deposits, if the interest of the bank in which the deposit is made will allow it? That bank must judge for itself whether it can safely pay interest upon these deposits.

But, sir, the most important question is that which the course of trade and business presents. The demands upon the West from the East constantly accruing make it necessary that the banks of the West shall be prepared to draw upon the East. Our shipments of produce and cattle make this necessary constantly. Practically it is about thus: a man wishing to buy produce or stock in the West borrows the money for a short period from one of our banks; that bank takes his check or draft payable in the city of New York; and when he has purchased his stock on his credit, and shipped it, and sold it in New York, out of the proceeds he meets his paper; and this money is then on deposit in the city of New York to meet exchange from the West to the East.

Now, it is not strange that the deposits in the cities mentioned by the Senator from New Jersey should be $70,000,000 when the reserve fund of these banks is only $40,000,000. The large business between the East and the West requires perhaps that amount of western funds in eastern banks. No bank in the city of Indianapolis, where I reside, could transact business for a day unless it was prepared to draw upon the East. Our business requires it. A merchant finds his indebtedness becoming due to-day in the city of New York. How is he to pay it? He does not want to send the money; but he buys exchange and pays it thus, and the bank makes a small profit, a very small profit, indeed, out of it. But to be prepared to meet that class of business, very important to our trade and commerce, the bank must have deposits in some eastern bank or it cannot carry on the business.

If the bank keeps constantly on hand a fund in an eastern bank, if it is the interest of the eastern bank to have that fund, and if that eastern bank can pay interest upon that fund, why not allow it? It seems to me that the business itself, the interests of the two institutions, will regulate that matter. If the bank in the East is transacting its business upon an unsafe system the western bank will not long credit it. Of course the western bank will seek to deposit in a safe institution in the East; and if that institution can afford to pay interest upon this large fund it is well that it should be done; and this is one of the sources of profit to the western stockholders. I do not know very much about banking; but it seems to me that this is a plain proposition. While the Senator from New Jersey may be right, and I think he is right, that paying interest upon deposits is not a safe system for the bank paying that interest, yet that bank must judge of that for itself. Its stockholders must look to their own interests. If it is a source of profit to have money on deposit at four per cent. they can judge of that.

I am not afraid of the evil complained of by the Senator from Ohio. If the banks in the East are allowed to pay upon deposits made by western banks, he fears that that will withdraw the banking capital and currency from the West to the East. I think, practically, that cannot be so, for it is known to the Senator from Ohio, as it is to myself, that the banks of the West, in the regular course of their business, make from eight to twelve per cent. It would be a remarkable fact if they should deposit their funds beyond the necessities of business at four per cent. when they can make from eight to twelve per cent. by the use of their money in the West. That cannot be. I know that the abuse which the Senator wishes to avoid does not exist. I shall vote to strike out this section. I do not expect to vote for the bill itself; but yet on this single motion I shall vote to strike out.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I voted for this section in the Committee on Finance, but not because I had any particular interest in the prosperity of any class of banks. So far as this discussion has progressed, it has settled down into a controversy between the interior and the city banks; and the only question that seems to be considered of any moment here is as to which class of banks shall make the most money out of the present condition of affairs. I have no interest whatever in that contest.

I have heard complaints from various sources that the people of the western States were without the necessary amount of circulation; and Congress is besieged from time to time with applications to extend the circulation in the western States, so as to accommodate the people there with monetary facilities. It appeared to me, from such evidence as I was able to obtain, that the present system had a tendency to deprive the people of the West of a circulation or of sufficient circulation, or of that amount of circulation, which they would have if this section became the law of the land.

It has been argued that it was improbable that the banks in the western States would put their circulation in the banks of the eastern cities and receive four per cent. upon it when they could loan that circulation in the neighborhoods where they do business for eight, ten, or twelve per cent. That argument would be good if the fact did not contradict it. No matter what the reasoning may be on the subject, the fact is admitted on all hands that seventy odd millions of circulation that belongs to the interior banks is deposited in the banks of the three great cities; so that in point of fact that amount of circulation is withdrawn from the people of the western States. That is a fact. What the inducements are I of course am not able to say; but it may be that this is a continuous loan to the city banks. It is not subject to those contingencies that loans to individuals are. It may be that the security is more perfect, and it is possible that this difference in the interest may be made up by the rate of exchange to some extent. Various considerations may influence the interior banks to adopt this policy; but whatever those considerations may be, whether sufficient or insufficient to our minds, the fact is that they produce this result, that this money that ought to be in the banks of the western States, there to accommodate the local necessities, is found in the banks of these great cities, to be used there for the purpose of stimulating speculation of all sorts and descriptions, which is the bane of the present day.

What is the reason, I will ask, for extending the banks of this country, multiplying these western banks according to the wishes of the American people, if, when a bank is located in any western State, it immediately commences the transaction of business in the city of New York or of Philadelphia? Multiply these banks, and you increase the circulation in the large cities, and the only effect is to stimulate speculation there, while the necessities of the people of the West are not relieved by the multiplication of your banks.

I am quite surprised, Mr. President, I must confess, to find such a stubborn opposition to this section, which was put into this bill, as I understood, for the express benefit of the western people. I am surprised to find them so unanimously opposed to it. If they manage to strike this section out of the bill I hope they will not come any more to Congress begging for additional banks; I hope we shall hear no more on that subject.

I have no inflexible theory upon this financial question. I judge from circumstances. I am willing to do what I can, consistent with the business interests of the country, to accommodate the western people. I supposed that this measure was intended for that purpose and would have that effect. But it seems that there is some danger that some banks located in the western States, no matter what the interests of the people may be, will not receive as much interest if this bill passes as they now receive. It appears to be a matter of no consequence as to whether they accommodate the people of that section or not in the estimation of Senators. I, knowing nothing about these banks, and caring nothing about them, had supposed that the object and effect of this section would be to prevent the flow of circulation from the western States to the eastern cities.

It is pretended here as a reason for this that the law requires these western banks to keep in the eastern cities a certain amount for the purpose of redeeming their circulation. What commentary does the Senator from Michigan make upon that assumption, when he said that he was told by a banker in the city of Detroit that during three years he was only called upon to redeem one ten-dollar bill. If that be true, then the seventy odd millions of money in the eastern cities is not necessary to redeem the circulation.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me one moment right there?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. While they were called upon to exchange greenbacks for only one ten-dollar bill, they had to daily redeem their deposits by exchange on New York.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that.

Mr. CHANDLER. I tried to beat the idea into the Senator's head; but it is hopeless, and I will not try it again. [Laughter.] It is the simplest business proposition that ever was presented to a man's common sense; but it is utterly hopeless to beat it into the Senator's head, and I resign the task.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator need not put himself to any unnecessary trouble to beat ideas into my head, because it is necessary, in the first place, that he should have some correct ideas in his own, [laughter;] and it is possible, in his zeal on this subject, that he is not so much governed by what the people of the West need and desire as by what the banks of Detroit or some other city need in reference to this matter.

Now, sir, I acknowledge—I have not pretended to deny—that there was a necessity for some deposits in the cities to meet the drafts of these local banks. Nobody has controverted that position; but the idea upon which this bill proceeds—and I am indifferent as to its passage, but I want now to have it understood that we are to have no more clamor from the West about additional banking facilities, when the whole effect of it is to increase the circulation in New York, Philadelphia, and Boston—I say the idea is, that when these city banks pay interest upon this circulation there is an inducement for withdrawing from the circulation in the West that which they need and putting it into the already exorbitant circulation of the cities.

This morning I received a circular. I do not know that any consequence is to be attached to it, but I find this statement in it—I suppose it is sent to all Senators; it appears to be a printed circular:

"Throughout the country trade is unusually quiet, and with the consequently limited demand for loans the banks of the interior are allowing large balances to accumulate with their correspondents here, which it is found difficult to employ except at exceedingly low rates, three and four per cent. being the current interest upon demand loans."

It seems that immense deposits of money are accumulating in these eastern banks, and at this particular time it is said that we must extend the circulation $20,000,000 and provide for the establishment of new banks in the West so as to accommodate the people. And now, when we undertake to provide by law to prevent this flow of circulation from the West to these cities we are met with the objection that it will not do to legislate in this way because it will injure somebody's bank in the western States.

I do not care particularly about the fate of this section, for the bill, as it is now amended, seems to me to be, with my little knowledge of financial matters, very nearly an absurdity. I do not pretend to know as much about finance as the Senator from Michigan, or many other Senators; but it seems to me to be an absurdity in finance to take, by an arbitrary law of Congress, $20,000,000 of circulation from one section of this Union and undertake to locate it in another section of the Union, disturbing, deranging, and breaking up business everywhere by your legislation. I undertake to say that Congress cannot control and regulate the currents of trade and commerce by any arbitrary legislation, and the less of it we have the better for the country; for the laws of commerce are surer and wiser and safer than any law that Congress can make upon the subject. So far as I am concerned I would rather now that Congress would drop this whole subject at once than undertake to invade the eastern States, where their capital no doubt is altogether employed in business, and withdraw from their business and their circulation $20,000,000, and undertake to send it to Texas or Oregon or California, or some other part of the country.

I only rose to give my reasons for supporting this section; but if the bill remains as amended, I do not care one straw what becomes of any of the sections.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I gave my consent in the Committee on Finance to this section purely on the principles enunciated by the Senator from New Jersey, as a question of banking. I do not believe that banks are created to borrow money; they are created to lend. I did it for this other reason, that the banking law of this country required a certain amount of reserve to be held by the banks, upon which no banking operations could be had except for the purposes of redemption; it was not to be used for the purpose of discounts; and yet by this evasion, by this simple process on the part of the country banks of depositing their reserves in the city banks, the city banks avail themselves of them for the purposes of discounts. I was unwilling myself, when the whole business of banking in this country had been revolutionized by our national system, to give greater facilities to the banks in the cities for mere purposes of stock-jobbing and speculation.

Before the inauguration of this system, when we had specie payments, the banks in the cities, although authorized to keep out as large a circulation as the banks in the country, never availed themselves of that privilege, for it was not possible that they could keep it out. The country banks then had to redeem their circulation once in every six or twelve weeks, but the city banks would be compelled to redeem their circulation almost daily or weekly; and therefore these banks of large capital, capital of millions, kept out but a very insignificant amount of circulation. One of the largest banks of this character, holding $10,000,000, as I am informed, kept out no circulation.

But the Senator from Oregon is very much mistaken if he supposes the West do not understand their interest about this matter. They will not be able if this bill should pass or not pass to discount one single dollar more than they otherwise would. If this reserve is kept at home, they cannot bank upon it. It will not increase their circulation in the least. They must keep it as a reserve.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It has been admitted here throughout this discussion that there were $30,000,000 of money on deposit in the city banks in excess of the reserve. I referred particularly to that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. That will not be affected by this law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That may be.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. This only relates to the reserve.

Mr. HOWE. You are mistaken about that.

Mr. CATTELL. It covers the whole.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Well, it will not be affected by it, because they can make their deposits with bankers, private individuals, and evade it; so that it will make no difference as to that. It is a necessity on the part of the western banks, and of all country banks, to keep their deposits in the city for the purpose of drawing upon them; and they do it from motives of self-interest, because they desire to obtain a larger rate of interest, and any person applying to them for a discount will not receive bills, but will receive checks upon which a greater amount of exchange will be charged than would be required to transport the bills from the city to the bank.

Mr. President, there is no question but what this section will tend to the benefit of the city banks and against the country banks. There is no doubt about that. The city banks will obtain the same amount of deposits, or nearly the same, for which they will pay no interest, and the country banks will be deprived of that amount of profits. It is not to be concealed that that will be the effect of the bill so far as that is concerned. The only question about it is whether we shall continue to foster and to strengthen these city banks or not. That is for every Senator to judge for himself.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I have not said a word in the course of this debate, and I did not think I should; but having listened to it considerably, I have come to the conclusion that I shall be obliged to vote for this amendment, notwithstanding the arguments urged against it by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CATTELL] yesterday, which have been repeated substantially by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to-day. I never like to vote against a measure supported by the Senator from New Jersey particularly; and whenever I do, I feel called upon to apologize, either publicly or privately. I have concluded to submit briefly my apology for the vote I am about to give on this question publicly. I should not have felt the courage to do that even but for the kind words thrown out by the honorable Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. SPRAGUE] just now in support of those who speak upon this subject without knowing anything about it. [Laughter.] Happening to fall within that category, I felt authorized to say a word myself upon it.

One reason I have for voting against the adoption of this new restriction was stated very emphatically and forcibly by the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] who has just resumed his seat. He gave utterance to a truth that has dimly suggested itself to my mind several times since this debate commenced, the idea whether, after all, this Congress, (and it is a very able Congress; I take it no man will doubt that,) in spite of its supreme ability, is able to manage the banking of the country better than the banks can do it themselves. The Senator from Oregon denies it, and I am inclined to think he is right. Up to this time the banks have managed this very subject, and, so far as I know, have done it with considerable success. Why not leave them to do it hereafter? He has confidence in their ability, and I have confidence in their ability, and why not let them play their hands? I am inclined to think we had better let them. That is one reason I have for voting against putting this restriction upon the banks.

But what are the reasons urged for the restriction? The Senator from New Jersey says it is a violation of a fundamental principle, not only in the national banking law, but in all banking systems whatever, which is that the banks should be required to keep a certain amount of funds in reserve; and he says that the national banking law recognizes that necessity, and requires of the central banks that they should keep twenty-five per cent. of their circulation and deposits as a reserve, and discriminates against them and in favor of the country banks by releasing the latter from the obligation of keeping any more than fifteen per cent. of their circulation and deposits, and he says that this is absolutely necessary to the safety and well-being of any banking system; and he says that this practice of depositing the reserve and of taking interest upon it is in violation of this fundamental principle and destructive of it.

I am not familiar with this subject, but I am inclined to think the Senator is wrong in assuming that the national banking law requires any such reserve as he states. It does say, I believe, in about so many words, that there shall be that reserve; but suppose there is not that reserve, what then? You cannot safely declare that a law requires a certain thing to be done or not to be done, until you examine the penalties or the means for enforcing the command. What, then, if the reserve falls below twenty-five per cent. in the central banks, or fifteen per cent. in the country banks? So far as I understand, the only penalty which is imposed upon the bank is that it is required to stop loaning. When its reserve falls below the twenty-five or fifteen per cent. it cannot discount time paper any longer; but it may go on still discounting sight bills. If I am right about this, then instead of the law requiring a reserve of twenty-five or fifteen per cent. it simply requires that the bank shall not loan on time more than seventy-five or eighty-five per cent. of its circulation and of its deposits; but the balance of the fifteen or twenty-five per cent. it may employ in purchasing sight bills.

If this is the true construction of the act, then this discrimination in favor of the country banks and against the city banks which the Senator from New Jersey complains of is not so apparent to me as it seemed to be to himself. But if he is right and I am wrong as to the interpretation of the act, is there not a hardship imposed upon the country bank from which the city bank is relieved, in this: the city bank is required only to redeem its circulation at its own counter; the country bank is required to redeem its circulation, and to be prepared to do so at all times, both at its own counter and in some one of the central cities? There is a double redemption for which the country bank must provide, and a single redemption for which the city bank must provide.

Mr. CATTELL. Allow me to say to the Senator that I have explained that several times. In order to provide for that double obligation the law allows two fifths of this fifteen per cent. to be kept there for that purpose and counted as reserve. There is no hardship in redeeming at another place when you provide that your reserve shall be kept there and counted.

Mr. HOWE. I understand that. There would not be any hardship at all in it if the law only required the redemption to be for the amount of three fifths of the reserve which they are allowed to keep on deposit at the central banks; but that is not the requirement of the law. The requirement of the law is that the whole circulation must be redeemed on demand at the central banks.

Mr. CATTELL. The whole circulation is not anything like three fifths of the reserve. The reserve is a percentage on the whole amount of deposits and circulation, so that the amount of reserve is infinitely larger than the whole circulation.

Mr. HOWE. It may be, or it may not be. I cannot say how that is. But the home liability must be provided for at the same time. I cannot regulate discount myself. I am only speaking of the obligations which the law imposes upon the two classes of banks. The Senator says, and says truly, that three fifths of this reserve may be deposited in the vaults of these redeeming banks, and when deposited there it shall count to the country bank just as if it was in its own vault. That is neither a privilege nor advantage, nor, perhaps, a hardship. It is a permission to the country bank to reckon three fifths of its reserve, which is not in its own vaults, but is in the vaults of one of the redeeming banks, as if it were in its own vaults; but then it is no more nor less, taken with the two fifths, than the fifteen per cent. after all.

But, after all, that does not provide for redemption. When your law has said to the country bank, "You must redeem your circulation and your deposits at home on demand, and your circulation in the city bank on demand," what obligation has it imposed upon the country bank? Simply this: it is a victim in the hands of the city bank, and it must make its own terms with the city bank. The city bank will not undertake to redeem the circulation of the country bank without compensation. That compensation, I take it, is in deposits, and what those deposits shall be is a matter regulated not by law, but by arrangement between the two banks. That is the obligation the law puts upon the country bank, and you have left them to mutual arrangements, mutual contract and understanding in order to effectuate, to execute this law; and so far the city and country banks have done it to their mutual satisfaction.

That the possession of these deposits is an advantage to the city bank all admit. The Senator from Vermont admits that. The Senator from New Jersey does not dispute that. But the Senator from New Jersey, and I think the Senator from Vermont, also, rather urged the idea that for the sake of getting this four per cent., which is said to be the amount paid on these deposits, the country banks were crowding their means into the city banks. I do not think that treats the country banks fairly. I do not think it is just, or that it pays due tribute to their judgment and discrimination; and they are smart. I do not believe that of the meager circulation and consequent capital, for after all our banking capital is to a great extent limited by our circulation in the West. I do not think it is fair to suggest that out of that small amount of capital they crowd a large portion of it into the cities to get four per cent., when they could loan it at from seven to ten in their own neighborhood. To meet this requirement of the city banks, to meet the necessities of trade, a large portion of their means are kept, I suppose, in the city banks to the advantage of those banks, and the four per cent. which the city banks pay for it helps to make up the account of profits to the country banks. This seems to me to be a perfectly fair and perfectly safe arrangement.

The Senator from Oregon says that if our country banks do these things we must not complain about having too little bank capital allowed to us. Sir, they do it because your law obliges them to do it; and if our banking capital was only half what it is they would still have to make the same proportionate use of it, in all probability, that they do now; and if it were double the sum that it is now they would still make the same disposition of it.

What is the grievance, what is the injury, that springs from this usage? The Senator from New Jersey has pointed us to the only one I have heard mentioned; and that is, that it stimulates to speculation; money piles up in the city banks and it stimulates speculation in the cities. That is a grievance; that is a hardship; that is an abuse, I suppose. I should be glad to put an end to it; and if I could see any way of putting an end to it now without imposing a hardship upon the country institutions I think I should be willing to do it. But I do not see that way; and until my friend, the Senator from New Jersey, shall show us that some one of these speculators cheated him, who lives there and is exposed them, I am not so very anxious to put an end to these speculations, especially when we have to pay the cost of ending them. If I should hear in some unhappy day that they had proved more than a match for him, and got the advantage of him, then I should seek more earnestly than I do to-day for some means of arresting that sort of speculation. That is the only abuse that I have heard of yet as growing out of this practice of paying interest on deposits; and I am inclined to think that, until I hear some other, I shall vote to allow the banks to pay it as long as they want to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on striking out the first section of the bill, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called) said: I am paired on this question with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. THAYER.] If he were here he would vote to strike out this section, and I should vote to retain it.

Mr. CATTELL. I feel it my duty to state that my colleague [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] was paired on this question with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. DRAKE.] He took some interest in it on the opposite side to the one I take. If he were present he would vote in favor of striking out this section. I thought it due to him to make this statement, as the Senator from Missouri happens to be absent and unable to explain it.

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Ferry, Harlan, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Sprague, Stewart, Trumbull, Vickers, Wade, and Yates—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Fessenden, Henderson, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Sherman, Sumner, Tipton, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wilson—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Conness, Corbett, Dixon, Drake, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Johnson, Morton, Norton, Nye, Ramsey, Ross, Saulsbury, Thayer, and Williams—17.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I will now offer an amendment—

Mr. SHERMAN. The question should now be taken on the amendment that I offered to your amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. Very well.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now offer the amendment that I read last night.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. While the Clerk is looking for that amendment, with the consent of the Senate I should like to remark that this day has so far gone by that it would be of no use to the Pension Committee, and I ask the Senate if they will not in their kindness give me Saturday, and make the business of the Pension Committee the special order for that day. This is the fourth time that I have been disappointed.

Mr. POMEROY. I suggest that we have an evening session for that purpose.

Several SENATORS. No, no; it is too hot.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I cannot consent to that. I want a whole day. I have seventy-five bills on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion can only be put by unanimous consent. Is there any objection? No objection; the Chair will put the question on the motion that pension bills be made the special order for Saturday next.

The motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL BANKS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill S. No. 440, supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now offer my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment is not strictly in order until the bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; let it be reported to the Senate.

Mr. RAMSEY. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator can offer his amendment in the Senate just as well. I know what the amendment is. I desire to have action on the amendment I have pending first.

Mr. RAMSEY. Very good.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee on the Whole. The question will be taken on the amendments collectively, unless a separate vote be demanded by some Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for a separate vote on the amendment to the fifth section. I desire to offer an amendment to that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be reserved. The question is on concurring in the other amendments.

The remaining amendments were concurred in.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now I offer my amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky to the fifth section in the nature of a substitute, and I ask that it be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment; which was to strike out all of the fifth section, as amended, after the enacting clause, and to insert in lieu thereof:

That to secure a better distribution of the national banking currency there may be issued circulation notes to banking associations organized in the States and Territories having less national banking circulation than five dollars per inhabitant; but the amount of such circulation shall not exceed $20,000,000; and the circulation herein authorized shall within one year be withdrawn pro rata from banks organized in States and Territories having a circulation exceeding that provided by the act approved March 3, 1865, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof;'" to ascertain which the Comptroller of the Currency shall make a statement showing the amount of circulation to be retired by each of such banks, and shall make a requisition for such amount upon such bank; and upon failure of such bank to return the amount so required within the year aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency to sell at public auction in New York an amount of the bonds deposited by said bank as security for their circulation equal to the circulation to be withdrawn from such bank, and with the proceeds to redeem so much of the notes of such bank as may come into the Treasury as will equal the amount required from them.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I do not know what the word "pro rata" means in that amendment. It seems to me it leaves it very dubious.

Mr. SHERMAN. The word "pro rata" is used in the law, and its effect is perfectly clear. This retirement of the circulation of banks having an excess is to be pro rata upon the amount of their circulation; that is, a bank of $100,000 would have to give up half as much circulation as a bank of $200,000. It is pro rata upon the circulation. The same expression is used in the original banking act. I think I have drawn this amendment very carefully. I have submitted it to several Senators. In my opinion it expresses the idea as near as it can be expressed in a few words.

Mr. RAMSEY. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Ohio how this surrender of their circulation by the banks is to be enforced?

Mr. SHERMAN. This proposition provides the mode, if the Senator had listened to it. They are required to surrender the amount of circulation assessed upon them within one year. If they fail to do it, the great body of this circulation comes into the Treasury of the United States or the sub-Treasury at New York, and the Treasurer will be bound to retain the notes of those banks, and the bonds of those banks to the amount of the circulation called for from them are to be sold for the purpose of redeeming these circulating notes. That is the only way in which it can be done. The objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky is that it did not point out a mode in which this circulation could be retired.

Mr. RAMSEY. Then I hope the amendment of the Senator from Ohio will be adopted.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the only difference that I know of between the two.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I move to amend the substitute by offering in lieu of it the original proposition which I made in committee, striking out all after the first word of the one and inserting the other. I ask the Secretary to read the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This amendment is in the third degree now, I understand.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I suppose that anything that is offered as a substitute may be amended.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose the proper way is to vote on the pending amendment. Then the amendment of the Senator from Vermont is to the original fifth section. This is an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, or rather an amendment to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Yes; but after having adopted the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, it will then be too late for me to offer my amendment, and therefore, in order to get a vote upon it, I must offer it now. I ask the Secretary to read the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

And that upon the issue of any increased national circulation provided for by this section the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to permanently withdraw an equal amount of United States notes.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is clearly not in order. We are now acting upon the action of the committee. That action of the committee is the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky, and I offer a substitute for that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am proposing to amend the amendment of the Senator.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Ohio offers a substitute for the section. Before that substitute is acted upon the Senator from Vermont proposes to amend the section by adding these words to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. But the section is out of the way.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator from Maine will hear a suggestion, that is not, I submit, what the Senator from Vermont proposes to do. The Senator from Vermont proposes to amend the original section as it stood. That was stricken out in Committee of the Whole, and an entirely different section, to which this amendment is not applicable, was substituted. Now, the Senator from Ohio moves to strike out that substituted section and to insert the amendment which he offers. The Senator from Vermont proposes to amend the original section, which was stricken out in Committee of the Whole, and is not before us at all.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, as the section now stands, as proposed to be amended by the Senator from Ohio, it will take from New England about twenty million dollars of banking capital. While I prefer that to a positive increase of our amount of circulation, yet I submit that it is not so well as it would be to adopt the original proposition as presented by me, which will make no disturbance in the amount of banking capital held by anybody, but will increase the amount by retiring an equal amount of United States notes.

I agree with the Senator from Oregon that this section will create a very considerable derangement of the business of New England, and that other portions of the United States have as much interest in her prosperity, in keeping the machinery at work in New England, as New England herself. The amount of banking capital there is used for what purpose? To keep the business of the country going. Take Rhode Island or Connecticut or Massachusetts. When their people purchase wool in Ohio or Illinois or Vermont they have not a sufficient amount of capital to go there and buy it from their own means; but ninety-five per cent. of all the money that is paid out for wool is obtained from banks in their own neighborhood. They could not get discounts in the western banks if they were to go there. The names that they would offer are entirely unknown there. Take the amount of stock that is purchased by drovers in New York, Vermont, Illinois, and Kentucky. When these men come from their own neighborhoods, they get discounts from their own banks; but if they come from the Atlantic coast they have to obtain discounts there; and it requires a great deal of money to move the amount of stock, of sheep, of wool, and of horses that is taken to market.

I only desire, Mr. President, to call the attention of the Senate to the difference between the propositions. It seems to be the general opinion that ere long we shall reach a system of free banking. Will you, then, for this little interim of time compel these banks to withdraw the amount of circulation that they now have out, to be restored to them in twelve or eighteen months hereafter? It seems to me that this is an unnecessary revolution. It is a difficult matter. It will make a fractional sum to all these banks that have to be curtailed; and then the question arises whether you are to take it from the large banks or the small banks. In all parts of New England a very considerable portion of this circulation is distributed in banks of a small amount of capital—of $50,000. The law sets forth that no bank shall be organized for less. Are you going to diminish these little banks? I submit that there are a great many difficulties about this question when you reduce it to this shape.

I suggested to the Senator from Kentucky a proposition which I think would be fair; that is, that when any of these banks should fail in New England, or should, from any reason, be wound up, then you should take the circulation of such banks and give it in quarters that were destitute. That would operate no hardship upon New England. But it seems to me that to take these banks and strip them according to a certain given percentage, big and little, great and small, is a species of oppression. The alternative which I present works no hardship upon anybody. It only retires an equal amount of United States notes and allows this increase. What is the objection to it? I trust that the amendment that I have proposed to the substitute of the Senator from Ohio may meet with the favor of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to know whether this proposition is in order or not before I make a brief reply to the Senator from Vermont?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has some doubt whether it is strictly in order; but at the same time perhaps the most convenient way and the simplest way would be to take a vote upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection. Now, Mr. President, let us look at the way in which this case stands. I am surprised at the position of the Senator from Vermont. The Committee on Finance, after the most careful consideration, settled a difficult question. A demand was made upon us for some circulation in twelve States of the Union, and we finally agreed rather than disturb the volume of legal tenders, to give them $20,000,000 of increased bank circulation. As a matter of course this did not affect the State of any Senator represented in the Committee on Finance, except the State of my friend from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON.] That was the proposition. In my opinion it is altogether the wisest; but the Senate has, on the question being presented by a motion of the Senator from Vermont, refused to decrease the amount of legal-tender notes in order to make room for this $20,000,000. That was done by a decided vote. Then the Senate, by a decided vote, aided by the Senator from Vermont, declared that these $20,000,000 should be deducted from the existing bank circulation. The Senator from Vermont advocated and supported that proposition. Every other member of the committee voted against it. He forced this proposition upon us. He voted for the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If the Senator will allow me, I say now I shall vote for it; but I do not think it is as good as the original proposition. I am against expansion. I am perfectly consistent. While I shall vote for this, if I cannot do better, I prefer to do better.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, I ask the Senator, a member of the committee reporting this bill, having once tried his proposition fairly, and having been voted down by ten or fifteen majority, is it worth while now, on this hot day, to waste more time? Suppose I should pursue the same course after having reported this bill, not having the slightest feeling in regard to it; suppose I should insist on having these questions debated and voted upon, and then voted upon all over again, the Senate would be out of patience with me.

Now, sir, the proposition of the Senator from Vermont is to retire $20,000,000 of greenbacks. Does anybody suppose that that can be done and receive the assent of both Houses of Congress at this session? It is perfectly idle to attempt to send such a proposition as that to the other House. Indeed, even in this body, a proposition to increase the volume of greenbacks would receive more votes than a proposition to diminish the volume of greenbacks. That was tried here early in the session, and I believe but five Senators voted to diminish the volume. Perhaps I am mistaken in that; I do not pretend to be accurate about a vote so long ago; but the Senate almost by a unanimous vote declared that there should be no further diminution of the volume of greenbacks. Why, then, renew the struggle? The question now is between getting this $20,000,000 by curtailing the greenbacks, or by curtailing the bank circulation.

I was glad to see, and I commend it as patriotic, many of the New England Senators, representing States that would be affected by this proposition, vote for surrendering up a portion of their circulation in order to make up this deficit in the southern States. I was glad to see it. The Senator from Vermont so voted. All the difference between my proposition and the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky, which I took as the sense of the Senate, is simply that this provides a mode and manner of effecting what the Senator from Kentucky desired to effect. I submitted it to him, and he agreed to it as probably the easiest and best way.

Many difficulties might suggest themselves. I can state many. The Senator from Vermont suggests one, that probably we had better take this off the banks of larger circulation. How can you regulate that at this time? It is utterly impossible. A reduction pro rata will affect any of these banks but very little; and I have no doubt that it will be made within a year with scarcely a perceptible flurry in the States that will be affected by it. If we intend to give to the southern States any national circulation we cannot do it on a better basis than the one we have now adopted. It is a mere temporary expedient. If we now refuse to equalize this circulation, or to take any step in that direction, what will be the result when twenty Senators come here on this floor to participate in our deliberations and demand some participation in the benefits of this national banking circulation?

It is said that it is now of no service to the States who have it. Then, if it is of no service to those States, why hang on to it so vigorously? But it is of service to every community to have a local bank, because its circulation is loaned out in the community; and we ought to do that much at least for the benefit of the southern States.

I believe myself that the result of our action and the result of all this long debate on this bill, the vote that has been taken refusing to correct the gross and palpable abuse by which national banks are drawing interest on their reserve, will react against the system more than anything that has transpired in Congress. When the national banks are not content with the benefits conferred upon them by law, but will insist also on drawing interest to the last dollar of their reserve, it will do more to weaken the whole system than anything that has transpired.

But I do not want to debate that over again. I trust that the Senate will stand by its action. It was made against my vote, and with the vote of the Senator from Vermont. Let us settle this question, and get it out of the way of other business that is now pressing upon us. The other sections of the bill, to which there is no opposition, I regard as important and as strengthening the banking system; and I desire to save what is left of this bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Before the vote is taken, that we may give it intelligently, I should like to inquire what the situation of this amendment is, and what is to follow it? The Senator from Vermont proposes now, I understand, to amend the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. If the amendment of the Senator from Vermont is carried, I inquire upon what will the Senate then be called to vote?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the Chair understands the amendment, it substitutes for the fifth section the proposition of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If the Chair will permit me, it leaves the section so that an increase of $20,000,000 will be allowed, but will require a withdrawal of an equal amount of United States notes.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I beg to state now in a word the attitude of this question, as I understand it, because I am not able to tell how my vote is to count if I vote for the amendment proposed. Originally, the proposition was to issue $20,000,000 of national currency. So that this amendment applies and was to the effect that a corresponding sum of United States notes should be retired at the same time. That is all intelligible. That proposition, however, was struck out altogether, and the committee inserted the provision offered by the Senator from Kentucky, in place of all these, that $20,000,000 should be withdrawn from the national banks now in excess. The amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio is merely to revise and improve, as he thinks, this provision of the Senator from Kentucky, to make it more effectual.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Make it work better.

Mr. CONKLING. Make it work better, as the Senator says. Now, the Chair will see that it is wholly repugnant to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont. His amendment has no relation whatever to this. Suppose it were adopted; we should then have before us an amendment providing that $20,000,000 should be withdrawn from the national banks, and that the Secretary of the Treasury should cancel $20,000,000 more of greenbacks. Is that what anybody means? Certainly not. Therefore I submit to the Chair, with great deference, that unless we are lost in the mazes of metaphorical confusion, or some other confusion, this amendment is out of order, and the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, being to strike out the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky and insert this revised edition of that, is the only thing upon which we can now vote.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think the Senator from New York fails to understand the proposition, or else I do. My proposition is simply to come in at the end of the section as it originally stood.

Mr. CONKLING. Now, if my friend will allow me, that section is not, and cannot be, before the Senate. Why? Because the Senate is acting upon the report of the Committee of the Whole, in which there is an absence of that amendment. It was expressly stricken out, and no such thing appears. My point of order is that there is nothing here to which this amendment can attach. The thing to which the Senator seeks to attach it is absent; it is gone forever, unless we reconsider the vote in Committee of the Whole and reinstate it in the bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I beg pardon; the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky attaches to the end of that section.

Mr. CONKLING. Not at all; there is where the Senator is mistaken. The amendment of the Senator from Kentucky obliterates that section and takes its place, and there it stands; and now the Senator from Ohio proposes to strike out that and substitute his section, and the Senator from Vermont offers an amendment to that which, if placed upon it, I say with all respect to him, would not only fail to make sense, but would be so repugnant as to be ludicrous.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Then I will vary the proposition so as to include the whole section as it stood when reported from the committee with this amendment, which I offer.

Mr. CONKLING. That may do; then we can vote intelligently upon that, but we cannot otherwise.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio has an ambiguous look upon it; and I should like to know what it means. If I read it correctly, it proposes now to increase the circulation $20,000,000, and then in the course of a year begin a system of reduction to reduce $20,000,000. That is the way it reads. There is to be an additional circulation thrown out at once of $20,000,000, and then in the course of a year there is to commence a reduction of $20,000,000 in the circulation where it is held in excess.

The effect of the proposition is simply to expand the paper circulation $20,000,000 now, and then reduce it again in a year. If the bill provided that this new circulation should be issued just in proportion as the existing circulation is reduced elsewhere, there would be no expansion of the circulating medium; there would be no stimulation of speculation or of prices by the action of the Senate; but if you give $20,000,000 new paper circulation now, and within a year from this time begin to reduce it again, you will have the effect of buoying us up and then letting us down again. I do not think it a wise system of finance. There is no stability in the circulation produced by this. It seems to me the amendment of the Senator from Ohio is defective in that it does not provide that the new circulation shall be issued as the old circulation is withdrawn and just in the same proportion. Then there is no expansion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to go over this so often. The law now limits the amount to $300,000,000. That limit stands, and is not effected by this provision. The total amount cannot exceed the present amount authorized by law. But this debate has grown to be a wearisome thing. I have listened to it; I have sat here and heard every thing in the world discussed except the question at issue. I do not think the limit fixed by law of $300,000,000 is at all changed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Well, Mr. President, this is a new law authorizing the expansion of the circulating medium $20,000,000. The effect of the bill is to authorize the putting in circulation of $20,000,000 of paper which is not in circulation now. It then provides for in a year beginning a contraction of $20,000,000, so as to bring yourselves back again where you are now. The effect of it is to give an unnatural stimulus by issuing $20,000,000 of bank paper, very soon to be followed by a retiring of the same $20,000,000 next year. What is the effect on credits, prices, and values? I think that unless we wish to adopt the principle of the expansion of the paper medium the amendment ought certainly to contain a provision which shall limit expansion as the other is retired during the year, so that there is no shock produced, there is no expansion produced, and there is no curtailment of the paper circulation produced by this law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment. The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to suggest a proviso to the section drawn by the Senator from Ohio, which perhaps he will accept; it carries out the original idea of the Senator from Kentucky:

Provided, That the $20,000,000 of additional circulation herein authorized shall be issued only as circulation shall be withdrawn as herein provided, so that at no time shall the whole amount of circulation notes exceed $300,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is almost precisely in the words of a proviso which I have drawn myself, which I will add to my amendment, in these words:

Provided, That the circulation herein authorized shall be issued only as circulation is withdrawn, and so that the aggregate circulation shall not at any time exceed $300,000,000.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection myself to the proposition of the Senator from Maine; I think it is a repetition of the meaning and effect of the proposition made by the Senator from Ohio. In that view of the effect of both propositions, I am willing, so far as I am concerned, to accept the proposition of the Senator from Maine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to inquire whether, under the amendment as now modified, with the proviso added, it is possible for the Comptroller to withdraw the $20,000,000 without issuing them to the southern States.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He issues precisely as he withdraws.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand that he cannot increase the total amount over and above $300,000,000; but is there any requirement that he may not decrease below that?

Mr. FESSENDEN. He is required to issue $20,000,000 more, and to withdraw for that purpose.

Mr. HENDERSON. I should like to have the amendment of the Senator from Ohio read in connection with the proviso. My understanding now is that under that proposition $20,000,000 may be withdrawn and not a dollar issued.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would not hurt the country any.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That to secure a better distribution of the national banking currency, there may be issued circulation notes to banking associations organized in States and Territories having a less national banking circulation than five dollars per each inhabitant; but the amount of such circulation shall not exceed $20,000,000; and the circulation herein authorized shall, within one year, be withdrawn pro rata from banks organized in States having a circulation exceeding that provided for by the act approved March 3, 1865, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof,'" to ascertain which the Comptroller of the Currency shall make a statement showing the amount of circulation to be retired by each of such banks, and shall make a requisition for such amount upon such bank, commencing with banks in States having the largest excess of circulation; and upon failure of such bank to return the amount so required within the year aforesaid it shall be the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency to sell at public auction, in New York, an amount of the bonds deposited by said bank as security for their circulation equal to the circulation to be withdrawn from such bank, and with the proceeds to redeem so much of the notes of said bank as may come into the Treasury as will equal the amount required from them: Provided, That the circulation herein authorized shall be issued only as circulation is withdrawn, and so that the aggregate of circulation shall not at any time exceed $300,000,000.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that after the words "circulation herein authorized," in the proviso, he insert the words "and actually issued." The proper construction of the language as it is will certainly give the Comptroller authority to withdraw $20,000,000 whether banking capital is used in the South or not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not at all. He can only withdraw for the purpose of issuing.

Mr. HENDERSON. If that be the idea there can be no objection to inserting the words "and actually issued" after the words "circulation herein authorized."

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is already issued—already out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole as thus amended.

The amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

Mr. RAMSEY. I suppose the bill is now open to further amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. RAMSEY. I offer this amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That when any national banking association shall desire to change its name or location, the directors of such association shall file with the Comptroller of the Currency a written statement, setting forth the changes proposed and the reasons therefor, and upon the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency the first and second articles of the organization certificate of such association may be amended by a vote of the shareholders owning three fourths of the stock, so as to provide for such removal and change of name, which amendment shall be certified to the Comptroller of the Currency under the seal of the association, together with the names of the shareholders and the number of shares held by each voting for or against the amendment. Whereupon notice shall be given at the expense of the association by publication for thirty days in one newspaper published in the city of New York, one in the city of Washington, and one in the place where such association is located, or if there be no newspaper at such place, then in a newspaper published at the nearest place thereto, that said association has taken the necessary steps to change its name and location, and calling upon all creditors to present their claims for payment, and at the expiration of thirty days from the first publication of said notice the office of the association may be removed as aforesaid; but provision shall first be made for the payment of its deposits and the redemption of its circulating notes at an office in the place where said association was originally organized for six months after the removal, and after the expiration of six months all deposits not paid shall be payable, and all circulating notes not redeemed shall be redeemable at the office of the association: Provided, That none of the rights of creditors, none of the liabilities of debtors, and none of the rights or liabilities of the association shall be in any way impaired or modified by such change of name or location; and the removal shall not be beyond the bounds of the State of its first location.

This amendment is intended to supply an omission in the original banking bill, and was drawn up at my instance by the Comptroller of the Currency, and meets his approbation. I have before me a letter of his, in which he says:

"Mr. Ramsey's bill, which I have marked as section three, was prepared originally under my supervision, and is intended to meet a want which has long been felt. Quite a number of applications have been made by national banks for the privilege of changing their names or location, all of which I should have favored if the law had given me power to do so. Several banks, organized originally in the oil regions, in localities where business was brisk and money plenty, have, by the fluctuations in the oil trade, and the failure of the oil wells, been left almost entirely without business, and have become entirely useless as banks. It would be very desirable if some provision could be made for their removal. I think the concurrence of three fourths of the stockholders and the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, which this bill requires, would prevent any abuse of the privileges therein granted."

It so happens that two or three banks in my State were located erroneously at the inception of this banking system; and they wish to remove to other and more desirable localities; the stockholders of the banks consent, and the people of the locality to which they wish to go desire to have them. I can see no reasonable objection to allowing them to do it, and I am surprised that having this unqualified approbation of the Comptroller of the Currency before them, the Committee on Finance did not recommend this proposition.

It was natural that in the first institution of these banks throughout the country some of them should have been mislocated, and it is surprising to me that the first law did not provide in some way for allowing a change of location.

Again, doubtless there must be occasion for the change of names. Surely, that is a very harmless thing, and there can be no objection, I imagine, to allowing a bank to change its name when that is desired under proper safeguards.

I am surprised that the Committee on Finance did not see this matter in the same light that those whom I represent and the Comptroller of the Currency did. Surely no harm can come from the proposition. It is, indeed, most obviously right. Why should there not be some proposition on the statute-book to meet the case? It may be said, let each case come here on its own merits, and a special law can be passed; but where errors are so certain to be made, where there must be necessarily many mistakes, why should we not provide a general remedy and not put parties to the inconvenience of coming to Congress in every special case. For myself I think the proposition is obviously right, and I hope the Senate will so regard it.

Mr. SHERMAN. We examined this matter of putting banks on wheelbarrows and wheeling them from one State to another and one county to another, and concluded that it would not do. If the business of a bank dies out in any particular place the law points out a mode in which it may be wound up very easily. We have provided a section hereunder which it can be wound up in sixty days, and then the stockholders can take their chance for a new location. The result of a proposition of this kind would be, as every Senator can see, that banking capital would concentrate in the large commercial ports with great advantage to banks and to the injury of the communities throughout the country generally. When the Senator from Minnesota comes to consider it and think of it, I am sure he will find that it is surrounded with difficulties. The Finance Committee unanimously rejected the proposition after fair examination.

Mr. RAMSEY. A very common mode of killing a thing that is right in itself is by giving it a bad name; and so the Senator calls this a proposition to move about these banks on wheelbarrows. Why did not the Comptroller of the Currency see it in that light? He makes no objection of that kind. The whole matter is in his province, under his constant supervision, and he sees no difficulty of that kind. When a bank is mislocated and another location is desirable, what possible harm can there be in allowing it to be removed from one place to the other?

Again, sir, to guard against any abuse of this privilege, it is required that a removal shall only take place with the consent of the Comptroller of the Currency. His supervision was your only guarantee against abuse in the first location of the banks. His assent was then required, as I now require it, to any change of location. The law requires a certain population in order to justify a bank of a certain capital. All these securities still remain in the law. The proposition which I have made is not to allow banks to remove themselves about on wheelbarrows, but it is simply to allow changes of location under proper supervision by the Comptroller of the Currency. He is the officer of the Government who has special charge of banking affairs, and the proposition is entirely agreeable to him. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment. I want to see whether localities that have not been accommodated can be accommodated.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 11, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cole, Cragin, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Vickers, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Conkling, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Henderson, Hendricks, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Cameron, Chandler, Conness, Corbett, Dixon, Drake, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Johnson, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norton, Nye, Ross, Saulsbury, Thayer, and Tipton—20.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. I propose an amendment, on which for myself I wish to take a silent vote, without calling for the yeas and nays:

And be it further enacted, That all laws imposing any tax upon the circulation notes or notes of issue made by any bank of any State or Territory, or imposing any tax in any form upon such banks, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 25, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Cragin, Davis, Doolittle, Ferry, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, McCreery, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Wilson—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Cameron, Conkling, Edmunds, Fessenden, Hendricks, Howe, Morgan, Sprague, Trumbull, Vickers, Williams, and Yates—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Conness, Corbett, Dixon, Drake, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Johnson, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Saulsbury, Thayer, and Tipton—15.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, (when his name was called.) I am paired with Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If he were present he would vote against the bill, and I should vote for it.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1059) to relieve certain citizens of North Carolina of disabilities, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. J. F. FARNSWORTH of Illinois, Mr. H. E. PAINE of Wisconsin, and Mr. J. B. BECK of Kentucky, managers at the same on its part.

On motion by Mr. STEWART, the Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1059) to relieve certain citizens of North Carolina of disabilities, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and

On motion by Mr. STEWART,

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

It was ordered that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore; and Messrs. STEWART, WILSON, and SHERMAN were appointed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 256) relating to the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we had better go into executive session, and not waste time about the order of business. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. POMEROY. Let the bill of the Senator from Michigan be taken up first.

Mr. SHERMAN. The question of taking it up will lead to debate. I think we had better go into executive session.

Mr. NYE. I hope the Senator will allow this bill to be taken up.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Debate is not in order on this motion.

Mr. POMEROY. On the motion to go into executive session I ask for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RAMSEY. I appeal to the Senator from Ohio to withdraw his motion. The Senator from Michigan, I understand, is willing when his bill is taken up to yield.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object to any debate. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Cole, Conkling, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Henderson, Howe, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Vickers—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Cragin, Ferry, Harlan, Hendricks, Howard, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Stewart, Sumner, Wade, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Corbett, Dixon, Drake, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Johnson, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norton, Saulsbury, Thayer, Tipton, and Williams—17.

So the motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 17, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ELECTION CONTEST—M'KEE VS. YOUNG.

Mr. COOK, from the Committee of Elections, to whom were recommittees the report and papers in the case of McKee vs. Young, of the ninth congressional district of Kentucky, submitted a report in writing, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That Samuel McKee was duly elected a member of the House of Representatives in the Fortieth Congress from the ninth congressional district of the State of Kentucky.

The report was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COOK. I desire to give notice that I shall call up this report some day early next week.

Mr. KERR. I desire to inquire if this is a report of the majority of the committee or only of a minority?

Mr. COOK. It is the report of the majority.

Mr. KERR. I was not aware that any such report had been agreed to.

Mr. COOK. The report was adopted in committee yesterday, in the absence of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KERR,] but the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] was present.

WASHINGTON GAS-LIGHT COMPANY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the president of the Washington Gas-Light Company be, and is hereby, requested to furnish this House without delay a statement showing the quantity in feet of illuminating gas furnished the Government of the United States by said company, and the amount of money received for the same from the 30th day of June, 1867, to the 31st day of May, 1868, and an estimate for the month of June, 1868, giving the quantity of gas furnished each month separately, and the amount of money received therefor; also, designating in said statement the quantity of gas furnished each department of the Government, and the amount received for the same; and the number of lamps supplied with gas by said company upon the streets, avenues, public grounds, parks, public gardens, &c.

STARK B. TAYLOR.

Mr. CULLOM asked and obtained leave to have withdrawn from the files of the House and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary the papers relating to the increased salary to Stark B. Taylor, bailiff of the Court of Claims.

TAX ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of bringing in a bill to collect the revenue on distilled spirits, on the principle of taxing the capacity of the still and apparatus, making due allowance for the waste, to contain provisions like the following:

First. Call in experts, builders, and operators to ascertain the utmost quantity which a still could produce in twenty-four hours, constant running.

Second. Let the distiller take out a license for just such time as he may choose to operate, paying or giving good security to pay the tax on all spirits which could be produced within the period of the license.

Third. If the distiller should be found to overrun the period of his license, he should be subject to imprisonment in the penitentiary.

Fourth. If any one should be found to have distilled spirits without a license he should be subject to like punishment.

Fifth. If there should be any unoccupied distillery, the key should be given to a revenue officer, who should be heavily punished if he should suffer it to go into the hands of any other person for the purpose of using the distillery.

Sixth. The keeping of any concealed stills should be heavily punished.

TAX ON BANKS.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for consideration at this time:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means are hereby directed to consider and report upon the subject of a tax on the capital, deposits, and circulation of all national and other banks of issue in connection with the bill directed by the House to be prepared.

Mr. RANDALL. I will not object to the resolution if the gentleman will include in his resolution the words "deposits of Government funds."

Mr. INGERSOLL. Very well; I will modify my resolution to that effect.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

HOT SPRINGS RESERVATION, ARKANSAS.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1276) for the sale of the Hot Springs reservation in Arkansas; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. ELDRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RIGHTS OF AMERICAN CITIZENS ABROAD.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following preamble and resolution for consideration at this time:

Whereas foreign nations should not be allowed to raise the question whether American citizenship was acquired by birth or adoption, the rights of citizenship being the same to all citizens; and whereas this Republic has pledged its faith to persons of all nations that residence, renunciation of former allegiance, and compliance with our laws make them citizens here, and the honor of the nation is pledged that such promise be redeemed, no matter whence came the citizen or how powerful the nation that denies it; and whereas Great Britain has, in defiance of the law of nations, a portion of her own history and the results of the war of 1812 lately established in her courts the dogma once a subject always a subject, and has in repeated instances refused to recognize the rights of American citizens by denying them the privilege of mixed juries, treating as subjects of her realm many of our citizens who had periled life in defense of this Government during the war of the rebellion, in some cases arresting and imprisoning for words spoken in this country; Therefore,

Resolved, That the President of the United States immediately demand from any foreign country who may have imprisoned American citizens for words spoken in this country acknowledgment as complete and ample as was made by Mason and Slidell, and if such apology is denied, he report the fact to Congress for its action; also, that he demand reparation in all cases where American citizens have been treated as subjects of a foreign Power. And that to all such persons now imprisoned the rights herein claimed shall be granted; and that he report to this House what he has done, if anything, to secure such rights and redress the wrongs above set forth.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I object, sir. This is a very grave matter, about which I know nothing, and yet a great many things are asserted. I object.

Subsequently Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, withdrew his objection; and the preamble and resolution went over for discussion.

J. HORTON.

On motion of Mr. WARD, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of J. Horton, and without leaving copies on file.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate of the United States, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed House bill No. 1059, to relieve certain citizens of North Carolina of disabilities, with amendments, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

NATIONAL SAFE-DEPOSIT COMPANY.

The SPEAKER. The question in order is the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 579) supplemental to an act to incorporate the National Safe-Deposit Company of Washington, in the District of Columbia, approved January 22, 1867, reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia. The pending question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What is it?

The SPEAKER. "The gross receipts to be taxed the same as the gross receipts of express companies."

Mr. BOUTWELL. Is the bill open for debate?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I wish to speak five minutes.

Mr. INGERSOLL. When the question is taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, I will yield the floor to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. At the expiration of the morning hour yesterday the House was dividing on seconding the previous question, no quorum voting.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I modify my demand for the previous question, so as to cover only the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes 21; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. TWICHELL and Mr. HOTCHKISS.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes 49.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Massachusetts for five minutes.

Mr. BOUTWELL. My objection to this bill, Mr. Speaker, is, first, to the principle of the bill. It proposes to endow a company already existing to receive on deposit articles of value and keep them in safes in a fire and burglar-proof building, and to charge commission and compensation therefor. It authorizes this company to receive moneys, the savings of the poor in this District and vicinity. Now, then, it is a well-fixed rule in England and France, and in this country, that savings institutions, which take the fruit of the labor of the poor, of widows and orphans, should not be allowed by law to do any other business whatever, involving the proceeds of the industry of these people who are not capable of taking care of their money themselves. Therefore I object to endowing this corporation with any power of this sort.

Then, in the next place, wherever savings institutions are properly established they are mutual. This is not. They are authorized to receive the savings of the poor, and are to publish annually the rate of interest they will allow and take the difference to themselves. Therefore it is merely endowing this corporation with the authority of Congress to borrow money for their own advantage instead of holding it in trust for the benefit of the depositors.

Then, in the next place, and it is a more serious objection, they are authorized to be pawnbrokers, to receive on deposit in trust personal property and real estate; and in addition to that they are endowed with a power which no corporation under any Government ever was endowed with, and that is to dispose of real estate put into their hands in trust without any proceeding of law or equity, only having the consent of the purchaser to the transaction. The person who deposits or places in their hands real or personal property by this act has no control over it whatsoever. I believe I have said enough, if enough can be said, to satisfy this House that no such power ought to be granted to that institution.

Mr. INGERSOLL. What part of this bill authorizes this company to dispose of property put in their possession without the consent or authority of the parties from whom they receive it?

Mr. BOUTWELL. The third section of the bill as it stands authorizes them to dispose of real estate put into their hands in trust without any proceeding in law or equity whatsoever.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire the Clerk to read the third section, as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said National Deposit Company be hereby authorized to receive and hold on deposit and in trust estate, real and personal, including the notes, bonds, obligations, and accounts of estates and individuals, and of companies and of corporations, and the same to purchase, collect, adjust, and settle, and also to sell and dispose of the same in any market in the United States or elsewhere without proceeding in law and equity, and for such price and at such times as may be agreed upon between them and parties contracting with them.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Is that satisfactory?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Speaker, in reply to some objections of the gentleman from Massachusetts urged against this bill I have to say that the city of Washington has not the population or business sufficient to sustain a corporation limited to the mere business of a savings-bank. A city with a floating or temporary population of fifteen or twenty thousand, and a permanent population of perhaps twice that number, can hardly expect to support a purely savings-bank. Consequently it is found necessary to couple with it some other business. The Safe-Deposit Company, which has been in operation long enough to give evidence of its utility, practicability, and necessity, propose to extend the powers of the company under the provisions of this bill. There are no better business men, perhaps, in the city of Washington than those who have organized this Safe-Deposit Company. They are now carrying it on; but with the best business ability brought to bear upon its prosecution they have only been able to make it pay current expenses.

Now, what is the length and breadth of this proposition? This company propose to receive on deposit such sums of money as people see fit to deposit with it, and on sums exceeding five dollars, if remaining a definite time, they propose to pay a certain rate of interest. They propose, in addition to that, to act as agent for parties who have estates to settle or who have real estate that they wish to sell. In other words, they propose to constitute themselves a general agent, under the authority of this bill, to transact such business as any party may see fit to put into their hands within the limitations of the bill. If they have the power to settle estates, and if they have power to insure a faithful performance of the duties imposed upon any trustee, what objection is there to that? None that I can see. What objection is there if any person owning an estate selects this company as trustee, with specific directions, to appropriate the rents and profits received from that trust to certain specific purposes? Suppose within a month after the trust is assumed the party directs this company to sell it, what need is there of any proceeding in a court of equity in such a case as that? None whatever. The party owning the property, personal or real, puts it in the hands of this corporation to be disposed of in accordance with the directions he shall give. In the disposition of property belonging to minors or estates this company will be subject to the orders and decrees of the courts.

Mr. O'NEILL. I ask the gentleman whether this bill proposes an extension of power in the franchise conferred upon this company?

Mr. INGERSOLL. It does.

Mr. O'NEILL. I will then take occasion to say, with the permission of the gentleman, a very few words in regard to the result of granting such powers in Pennsylvania to companies of this kind. There is a number of these companies that have been organized in Philadelphia within a few years past, which have had trust powers conferred upon them by the Legislature at the suggestion of the courts, and now many trust estates are being settled by such companies, either on the application of the parties themselves or upon the decisions and adjudications of our courts, not only to the great convenience of parties interested, but insuring greater safety to them. I think the extension of this franchise to this company is a most excellent idea, and I hope, from what I have known in my own experience of the carrying on of such institutions, that this House will grant the extension. It is most assuredly for the convenience of the people. I do not see what liability there is of losses, and why there is not sufficient responsibility for the funds put in their possession in trust. The power to control that trust is certainly with the courts, and any wrong doing by this company, just as I have seen it in my own State, would subject it to a decision of the courts, and they could be forced by the power of the courts to do what is right and proper, and in equity toward the parties whose funds have been placed with them in trust.

Mr. STEWART. Is the gentleman aware that this bill allows this corporation to purchase and sell real and personal estate?

Mr. O'NEILL. Yes, I am aware of that. They can do it upon certain conditions.

Mr. STEWART. They can purchase and sell any kind of real and personal estate, and there is no condition whatever.

Mr. O'NEILL. It is not an absolute power.

Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir, absolute.

Mr. RANDALL. Will my colleague tell me what act of the Pennsylvania Legislature ever gave such powers as are provided for in this bill?

Mr. O'NEILL. I can tell my colleague what acts of the Legislature of Pennsylvania conferred such powers as these, and what companies possess them. They are well known to him. Our Philadelphia Saving Fund Company has all these powers.

Mr. RANDALL. That has been in existence ninety years, and is in existence without any legislative enactment.

Mr. O'NEILL. It was chartered perhaps eighty or ninety years ago; but its powers and franchises have from time to time been increased by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and there are other companies.

Mr. RANDALL. They have no power to buy and sell real estate except for the location of their own place of business.

Mr. O'NEILL. I do not say they have. I am speaking simply to the point of giving this corporation power to receive funds upon trust; and I know from actual experience in our own State that such companies as this, with such powers, have done and are doing great good for those whose funds are placed in their charge.

Mr. RANDALL. And some of them have done great harm.

Mr. O'NEILL. Not one of them that I know of.

Mr. RANDALL. One of them is before the courts at this time.

Mr. O'NEILL. That is not the same kind of company. It is a deposit company. The power to which I am speaking now is the power of acting as trustees. I know there have been some worthless deposit companies.

Mr. RANDALL. There is everything embraced in this bill.

Mr. O'NEILL. I am speaking only to this one power to which, I understand, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL.] objects. All the leading safety-fund companies in Philadelphia have power to accept funds as trustees.

Mr. PRUYN. I suggest to the friends of this bill that it be recommitted to the committee, with authority to the committee to report it back at any time, in order that it may be perfected. It is open to objections which it is almost impossible to obviate in a discussion of this sort. Those difficulties may be obviated if the bill be recommitted, and, if it is in order, I will make that motion.

Mr. BLAINE. What is it?

Mr. PRUYN. That the bill be recommitted to the Committee for the District of Columbia, with power to report it at any time.

The SPEAKER. The motion to recommit is in order if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] yields the floor for that purpose, but the power to report at any time requires unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield the floor to enable the gentleman from New York to move to recommit the bill?

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir, I do not. It would have been well, perhaps, had this bill been printed, for I see that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] is under great misapprehension in regard to the provisions of this bill, especially in regard to the third section. That section does not provide that this company shall have uncontrolled authority to dispose of any estate, personal or real, held in trust by it; there is no such authority conferred. They have authority to hold estates and settle them, to collect indebtedness to estates, to hold and dispose of real property; but it is subject to the decree of the court having jurisdiction of the estate, and which puts the estate within the control of the company. It is regulated by the decree of the court; otherwise this company never can act as trustee of any funds belonging to estates. Am I not right in that?

Mr. BOUTWELL. They can of individual funds.

Mr. INGERSOLL. What objection is there to that? I have spoken of what are the rights of this company, so far as concerns estates belonging to minors and others. But an individual, having the absolute right to dispose of his own property as he sees proper, puts his property, real and personal, in the hands of the company to dispose of for him, according to such terms as he may dictate. Is there anything objectionable in that? This company has no more right to touch the estate of any minor or any ward, or to touch any trust fund whatever, without a decree of the court first made conferring that authority, than I have. Therefore I do not see that there can be any valid objection to the powers conferred by this section.

Mr. PRUYN. There is nothing in this third section about a decree of a court.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will the gentleman tell me how this company can get the legal control of the estate of any minor or person of full age, or of any estate whatever, without the authority of a court?

Mr. PRUYN. I have just read that section. If I understand it at all, and can comprehend what it means, it confers a general authority to deal in real and personal estate. Now, I hold that that business ought not to be connected with the business of a savings-bank; the two things are not compatible with each other, and ought not to go together. There is no reference whatever to any court; there is no reference to any judicial order being requisite for the acceptance of this trust.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have not said otherwise. But I have said that it is not possible for any corporation or person to assume the legal control of any estate, trust fund, or trust property, without the sanction of a court. I deny that the third section confers the right upon this company to deal generally in buying and selling real estate.

Mr. PRUYN. Will the gentleman agree to have this bill amended so that this company shall only hold such property as may be placed under their control by the order of some court of competent jurisdiction?

Mr. INGERSOLL. So far as relates to any estates of minors, &c., I will.

Mr. PRUYN. To everything.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir. What do I need of an order from a court if I wish to select this company to sell real estate for me?

Mr. PRUYN. I do not want this company to do any business of the kind.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I may want it, and I would prefer this corporation to a land agent.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Why is a corporation needed to buy and sell land and other property unless it is to get rid of all liabilities so as to pocket the profits? What security is there for a corporation to deal in lands and chattels?

Mr. INGERSOLL. None whatever, and there is no such authority conferred in this bill. I will offer an amendment to the third section which may obviate some of the objections urged against it. I move to amend the third section by adding to it the following:

Provided, That all deposits received and appropriated in conformity with this act, and all business transacted in relation thereto, shall be separate and distinct, and in no way connected with deposits made for safe-keeping and business transacted in relation thereto, as provided in the act to which this is a supplement.

Mr. PRUYN. Of course they will do that without any such authority.

Mr. POMEROY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will.

Mr. POMEROY. If I understand this bill correctly, there is now in existence in this city a safe-deposit company, with a charter giving it powers as such. The first and second sections of this bill, if I understand them correctly, give them the power of a savings-bank. The third section gives them the powers of a trust company. So that if the bill becomes law you will have a safe-deposit company in the city of Washington with full powers as a safe-deposit company, with full powers as a savings-bank, and with full powers as a trust company. Now, sir, I wish to ask the gentleman whether he believes it safe in any particular instance or as a rule to be generally applied to the conduct of these businesses throughout the United States to intrust any company with the exercise of corporate powers as dissimilar as are necessary for the management of such a company?

Mr. INGERSOLL. If that is the question, I am ready to answer it.

Mr. POMEROY. That is the question. Is it safe that three classes of business, entirely separate and distinct, should be included under one charter and exercised by one direction?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to reply to that. If the Congress of the United States were in session in the city of New York or Philadelphia or Boston or Chicago or St. Louis or Cincinnati, and had exclusive jurisdiction with regard to all legislative powers therein, I should answer the gentleman like this: as any one of the various businesses to which he has referred would afford, properly conducted, legitimate profits to any well-conducted company, I would separate them. I would not allow them to be consolidated so far as my vote was concerned. But if I were asked to give the safe-deposit company of some little village in addition the powers of a savings-bank, and of a general trust company, if you please, I should say I would, because the exercise of those powers in a village of two or three or five thousand inhabitants would not endanger the interests of the country or the rights of parties with whom this institution should do business. Now, in the city of Washington it has been tried and proved that a safe-deposit company, no matter how well managed, is not a paying business. Such men as Jay Cooke and others organized this Safe-Deposit Company nearly two years ago. They have conducted it well thus far, but it barely pays expenses. They have put up a first-class building, and put in it as good safes as are in the country. It is well regulated in every regard. That is its character. But, sir, it does not pay. They have lost money. It does not pay any profit. I know something about it, and I say that it has not been remunerative.

A MEMBER. I suppose the gentleman will not cut off debate.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir. You shall all be heard. There is plenty of time. There is no limit to-day, as there was yesterday.

Mr. Speaker, these men, after having faithfully tried to sustain themselves under their present charter, find that it cannot be done. There is, so far as I know, no savings-bank in this city. It is not believed that a mere savings-bank will be remunerative. These men, believing they have facilities, capacity, and the necessary qualifications all round, ask Congress to allow them to incorporate that business into the one they are already prosecuting. In addition, they have asked Congress to allow them to do business as the agent of any party who may select them. If you do not want to trust them you need not employ them. If you think you can find a better trustee you can employ him; there is no compulsion. That is all of that. If Congress does not think it compatible with individual rights to grant these powers to this corporation then vote them down. But I assure gentlemen that these men associated in this bill are men of integrity and well qualified to discharge these various powers under the authority of this bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to take a vote on the proposition whether the powers of a savings institution shall be added to those of a safe-deposit company. I therefore demand the previous question.

Mr. CHANLER. I understand the gentleman to say there is no savings-bank in this city. I do not wish to contradict him, but I am under the impression that there is one advertised as the Freedmen's Saving and Trust Company.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The gentleman has, perhaps, given the Freedmen's Bureau more care and attention than I have.

Mr. CHANLER. No, sir; I am not more familiar with that institution than he is, but I do not want the gentleman to mislead the House. I want him to stick to the facts.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If the gentleman has found out the fact which he states, I was not aware of it.

Mr. CHANLER. The gentleman is chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia, and professes to know something about the affairs of the capital, and he makes the positive statement, as I understand, that there is no savings-bank in the city of Washington, and upon that he bases his argument in favor of a provision in this bill. I wish to know whether I have misapprehended him in his statement.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not know upon what authority the gentleman makes this statement, but I am willing to believe what he states if he is.

Mr. CHANLER. The gentleman says he does not know that there is such an institution. Now, I ask him if he did not vote for the passage of just such a bill as this through this House, reported by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BALDWIN.] And I would like to know if there is not such an institution in this city at this time. I do not think it is fair to induce members to vote for a banking institution like this under the plea that no institution for savings alone can be supported in this city, when there is such a savings institution now in existence.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRUYN,] who wishes to offer an amendment.

Mr. PRUYN. For the purpose of reconciling conflicting views as to the third section, I propose to strike it out and offer the following as a substitute:

That the said company may execute any trust as to real or personal estate which may be agreed upon according to law or which may be authorized by any court of competent jurisdiction, and on such terms and in such manner as such court may from time to time order and direct.

I will explain the amendment in a word. It authorizes any individual to make any legal agreement with this company in regard to any trust as to real or personal estate under authority of law, and also authorizes the company to execute any trust as to real or personal estate which may be conferred upon them by any court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Well, I will accept that, and ask a vote upon it. I now yield to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that no amendment whatever can make this bill fit to be passed by this House. I therefore am opposed to the amendment moved by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRUYN.] I wish to express here, as I did in the committee, my opposition to the bill, and the opposition expressed there by a portion of the committee. It is a bill that should not pass.

Mr. BROOMALL. I ask permission to offer an amendment, to strike out the third section and insert in lieu of it the following:

That the said company be, and they are hereby, authorized to keep a hotel, to open and maintain a barber's shop and a lager beer saloon, and to conduct any other business that will pay.

[Laughter.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. I agree to that, provided the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] shall run the lager beer saloon. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, the gentlemen who are interested in this institution are anxious to make it a success. They want nothing but what they think right and legitimate; but as there is apparently considerable opposition to the third section, I will move that it be stricken out, because I would rather have the bill without that section than to have the bill fail. I renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. PRUYN. I withdraw my amendment. Mr. SCOFIELD. Is it in order now to move to lay the bill on the table?

The SPEAKER. It is; and as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] has given notice of such a motion as soon as the gentleman from Illinois surrendered the floor, the motion will now be considered as made.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to lay the bill and amendments on the table.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Is it understood that the third section of the bill is stricken out?

The SPEAKER. The motion to strike it out is pending.

Mr. INGERSOLL. And I have called the previous question on that motion.

The SPEAKER. The demand for the previous question is pending, but the motion to lay on the table takes precedence.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I simply want the House to understand that I am willing it shall be stricken out.

The question was put on Mr. BENJAMIN'S motion; and there were—ayes 66, noes 32.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I call for tellers.

Mr. KELSEY. I demand the yeas and nays. We may as well order them at once. It will come to that in the end.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 85, nays 32, not voting 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Boaman, Beatty, Beck, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Boyer, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Cary, Chanler, Churchill, Reader W. Washburn, Welker, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—72.

So the bill and amendments were laid on the table.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill and amendments were laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. As the House has sent this bill to the gentleman's "hole in the sky," I do not see the necessity of this motion.

JUDGE ADVOCATE OF THE ARMY.

The morning hour having expired,

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a draft of a proposed law relating to the Judge Advocate of the Army, with the approval of the Department; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE TEXAS CONVENTION.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House resolutions of the Texas constitutional convention, asking that the reconstruction laws be so amended as to transfer the power to appoint and remove registers from the military commander of the fifth district to the convention; also asking Congress to authorize the organization of a militia force by the convention, to act in conjunction with and under the direction of the military commander, for the protection of the lives and property of citizens, now every day preyed on by assassins and robbers, and expressing their confidence in General Reynolds, the commander of the district of Texas, that he will, to the extent of the means placed at his disposal, give protection and preserve the peace.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DODGE asked and obtained indefinite leave of absence.

Mr. BARNES asked and obtained leave of absence for five days.

CAPTURE OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1277) to provide for the distribution of the reward offered by the President of the United States for the capture of Jefferson Davis; which was read a first and second time, recommitted, and, with the report accompanying the same, ordered to be printed.

ANTIETAM CEMETERY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted a report on the subject of burying confederate dead in Antietam cemetery; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. PAINE. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table the amendment of the Senate to House bill No. 1059, to relieve certain citizens of North Carolina of disabilities, and have it referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

No objection was made, and the amendment was referred accordingly.

PROMOTION OF AMERICAN COMMERCE.

The SPEAKER. On yesterday the House was considering, as the special order, the river and harbor appropriation bill as in Committee of the Whole. On the 27th of May the House granted unanimous consent that House bill No. 929, to promote American commerce, should be taken up after the morning hour on a day fixed, to the exclusion of any other business whatever. That bill has been twice put off, but is now reached. The pending question is upon a substitute reported from the Committee on Commerce. If there is no objection the substitute will be regarded as an original bill, for the convenience of amendments.

No objection was made.

The substitute was read. The first section provides that section four of an act entitled "An act amendatory of certain acts imposing duties upon foreign importations," approved March 3, 1865, and section fifteen of an act entitled "An act increasing temporarily the duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved July 14, 1862, shall be amended so that the tonnage tax therein imposed shall be collected only from vessels arriving from foreign ports.

The second section provides that a drawback equal to the duties paid be allowed to shipbuilders on lumber, cordage, iron, copper, chains, and anchors actually used and employed by them in the building and rigging of any ship, steamer, or other vessel built within the limits of the United States; the amount of drawback in all cases to be ascertained and paid in such manner and under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury; provided that five per cent. on the amount of all drawbacks so allowed shall be retained for the use of the United States by the collectors paying such drawbacks respectively.

The third section repeals the fifth section of an act entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels," approved December 31, 1792.

The fourth section provides that hereafter boats or other vessels of the United States less than twenty tons burden shall not be enrolled, and no certificate of registry shall be required of them; and that such boats or vessels shall be licensed, and in every other respect be liable to the rules and regulations and penalties now in force relating to registered and enrolled vessels.

The fifth section extends the provisions of the act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue registers to vessels in certain cases," approved December 23, 1852, to vessels built within the United States; provided that the same were not transferred during the rebellion to foreign owners.

Mr. ELIOT. I now move to recommit this bill.

Mr. MORRELL. I desire the gentleman to yield to me to offer an amendment.

Mr. ELIOT. I will hear it read.

Mr. MORRELL. I desire to move to amend the second section by inserting after the words "United States," where they first occur, the following:

And in order that American lumber, cordage, iron, copper, chains, and anchors may be used in the construction of American vessels, a bounty equal to the drawback allowed on such foreign articles shall be allowed and paid, where American articles are actually used in such construction.

Also to further amend the second section by inserting the words "and bounty" after the words "the amount of drawback."

Mr. ELIOT. I will permit the amendment to be offered, but I do not commit myself to its support.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to offer some amendments to this bill.

Mr. ELIOT. I will hear them read.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to move to amend the first section by adding to it the following:

Provided, That vessels of the United States touching at Canadian ports shall not thereby be subjected to the tonnage tax.

Also, add to section five the words, "with a view to avoid the risk of sailing under the American flag, and for that purpose only;" so that the section will read:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue registers to vessels in certain cases," approved December 23, 1852, are hereby extended to vessels built within the United States: Provided, That the same were not transferred during the rebellion to foreign owners with a view to avoid the risk of sailing under the American flag, and for that purpose only.

Mr. ELIOT. I will allow those amendments to be offered.

Mr. LYNCH. Will the gentleman allow me to offer an amendment to the first section?

Mr. ELIOT. I will hear it.

Mr. LYNCH. I desire to move to amend the last clause of that section by inserting the words "of foreign nations" before the words "arriving from foreign ports."

Mr. ELIOT. I will allow the amendment to be offered; and now I renew the motion to recommit.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have an opportunity to bring before the House a bill which I regard of such national importance to the shipping interests of the United States as the one which is now under consideration. It is called "A bill to promote American commerce." That title, however, does not indicate fully the importance of this bill. It is, in fact, a bill which is calculated, so far as legislation may do it, to enable the United States, as a marine power, to assume the position among the nations of the earth held prior to the year 1861. This Government of ours, the knowledge of which has been mainly carried to every port and to every clime by the stars and stripes, has now reached a point when it becomes necessary that Congress, by appropriate and wise legislation, shall so enact that, in the language of the sea, we may be enabled to "heave out" our flag again, that we may show to our foreign rivals that we still live; or else we shall be obliged to "lower our flag" to the British lion; or else—and I say it to gentlemen on this floor, for I believe it will come to that—we shall have to "hang out the white flag" in the presence of the commercial navies of the world.

Mr. Speaker, it was to avoid either of these last alternatives that I have been permitted by the Committee on Commerce to report the bill now before the House, and I cannot but express my gratification at being able to do. This is, I believe, the only bill which has emanated from that committee during the last four or five years that has had in view the general commercial and shipping interests of the United States. During the pendency of the war it was not surprising the committee should not report in that direction, because we know in the midst of arms commerce, as well as law, must be silent. But since the rebellion has closed times have gone on worse and worse for the great shipping interests of the country, so that now, unless we in some way legislate for the protection not of one section, but of that national interest, there is imminent danger it will entirely die out. Sir, with the convictions I have of the importance of this legislation, I should be false to the duty which has been confided to me as one of the guardians of the commerce of this country if I had failed to bring to the House at as early day as I could some measure similar to the one before us. And I do hope I may have the attention not only of my colleagues on the committee, but of the members of the House, so far as to enable me, if I can, to satisfy them this legislation is necessary. If I cannot do that I shall defer with regret, as well as I may, to the judgment of the House. I want to do this briefly and plainly, explicitly and clearly as I can. I desire to show that the condition of our commercial tonnage demonstrates that the combined effects of war, heavy taxes, a deranged currency, and oppressive legislation have been so disastrous that the existence—I do not say the prosperity—the existence of our foreign commerce in American vessels is in imminent danger of destruction. If I can do that, then I am quite sure—if I can satisfy the House that this measure is right—I shall have their countenance, because I know that being true, we shall all of us admit some legislation is required.

Then I would like to say, briefly as I can, how far this law would afford relief. I wish to say right here and in advance to argument opposed to this bill, that the passage of the bill, so far as the main section is concerned, the second section will not operate to the prejudice of the revenue of the country. It calls for the remission of duty on certain articles imported and used in the construction of vessels. If the shipping interests of the country were as they were when ships were being built at all our ship-yards, the argument would be strong that to remit duties on materials imported from foreign countries, which enter into the construction of vessels, would materially affect the revenue interests of the Government. But what if no vessels are built; what if no ships are constructed; what if your shipping interests were killed off; what if your ship yards are dismantled; what if the capital employed in building vessels is diverted from it? If no ships are built no revenues will be derived. I propose to show that is the condition of affairs rapidly coming in this country. While no revenue will be lost it will on the other hand enable the shipping interest to contend with the other difficulties, which still lie before them. Before specie payment is resumed, unless this bill or some measure similar to it shall be passed, it will be too late to revive the shipping interests; we will have to recreate and reconstruct them.

Mr. Speaker, you do not want me to say that a maritime nation that is not willing to be a third or fourth class Power must build its own vessels and control its own carrying trade. This country of ours rests its claim to international respect upon three foundations: agriculture, commerce, and manufactures. I say that each of those interests ought to contribute its own strength to the common glory of the country. There are countries that are purely agricultural; there are others that are almost solely agricultural. Their products are sent to the markets of the world, but not in their own vessels or by their own means of transportation. In other countries the busy brain and the working hand are constantly employed at low wages manufacturing commodities for other people. But neither the agricultural nor the manufacturing people can take the highest rank among nations, nor can a commercial nation be a first-class Power unless it builds its own vessels and controls, to a great extent, its own carrying trade. That, sir, is the law of commercial life. It is not the law of the United States only, nor the law of England alone, nor of France alone. It is not the law of to-day only, nor was it the law alone when Phœnicia or Venice controlled the seas; but it is to-day, and ever has been, the great law of national commercial life. It is like that law of justice which Cicero so well describes: "Nec erit alia lex Romæ, alia Athenis, alia nunc, alia post hæc; sed et omnes gentes et omni tempore, una lex, et sempiterna et immortalis continebitur."

Mr. Speaker, the men who legislated in these Halls in the early days of our Republic recognized the force of this law and walked in the light of it. Among the very earliest of your acts will be found one that recognized substantially the principle of the first section of this bill. And then afterward our navigation laws were passed, under which our commerce, from small beginnings, by rapid strides, advanced until it reached the highest point in 1861.

No man of us, Mr. Speaker, who has visited foreign lands, has failed, I am sure, to feel pride because of the commercial rank his country has held. For it is maritime superiority that gives rank among the nations of the earth. Neither an agricultural nor manufacturing nation, but the nation which controls the seas, is recognized as first among the nations. That has been so in all times—from the time, some fifteen centuries before the Christian era, when Danaus carried his ship from Egypt into Greece, down to this day.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire briefly to show what the condition of affairs is now in this country. Some weeks ago the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE,] in the course of an able and carefully prepared argument on this subject, referred to certain statistical tables which he had collected tending to the same point to which I want to call your attention. The facts that I have to state are different from those given by him; that is to say, gathered from different sources, but in aid of the argument there presented.

The total tonnage of the United States at the end of the fiscal year 1861, which was the year in which we reached our highest point, was 5,539,813 tons. This includes tonnage of all kinds, coastwise and inland, sail and steam registered tonnage. On the 30th of June, 1867, the amount of tonnage was reduced to 3,868,615 tons. That is to say, the whole tonnage in the course of these six years decreased 1,671,198, or nearly one third.

But, Mr. Speaker, foreign tonnage suffered more during that period than coastwise and inland tonnage. In 1861 we had 2,540,020, and in 1867 we had 1,178,715 tons. That is to say, we lost 1,361,305, or more than one half of the whole tonnage between 1861 and 1867. If we had the returns of 1868 they would show a still greater reduction.

But this is not all. In 1864, I think, a bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce for the readmeasurement of the tonnage of the country in order to enable us to know what the actual tonnage was; for the old laws did not in any way determine that. The effect of the law of 1864 was to diminish the apparent tonnage by between ten and fifteen per cent. Now, if an allowance be made of ten per cent., which is less than it ought to be, and that is deducted from the tonnage of 1867, it will appear that the loss of foreign tonnage between 1861 and 1867 is, in fact, fifty-eight per cent. This is the actual loss. It will terminate, if we go on decreasing in this way, after a few years in an absolute and total loss.

I have here another statement tending to show that same fact.

In the Merchants' Magazine I read recently an argument for our foreign commerce, from which I give the following extract:

"We have prepared the following table for the purpose of indicating the changes which have taken place in the registered sail tonnage of the country for the eight years from 1789 to 1797, and from 1797, by decades, to 1867:

Year.	Reg'd sail Tonnage.	Change.	Rate per cent. of change.
1789.....	123,893
1797.....	597,777	increase in 8 years.....	478,884 or 384 1/2
1807.....	848,307	increase in 10 years.....	250,530 or 42
1817.....	800,725	decrease in 10 years.....	47,582 or 5 1/2
1827.....	747,170	decrease in 10 years.....	53,555 or 6 1/2
1837.....	809,343	increase in 10 years.....	62,173 or 8 1/2
1847.....	735,682	decrease in 10 years.....	426,359 or 52 1/2
1857.....	2,377,094	increase in 10 years.....	1,141,412 or 92 1/2
1867.....	1,178,715	decrease in 10 years.....	1,198,379 or 50

"This table shows an average gain of eighty-one per cent. for the periods given, including the remarkable growth which took place between 1789 and 1797, when, in consequence of the wars then prevailing among the maritime Powers of Europe, our foreign tonnage increased three hundred eighty-four and a half per cent., and including also the decades between 1807 and 1827, when there was a decrease of five and a half and six and a half per cent. respectively. As the period from 1789 to 1797 may be considered exceptional, let us refer to the growth of our foreign tonnage during the three decades between 1827 and 1857; the first of these shows an increase of only eight and a third per cent., and yet the average of the three is fifty-one per cent. In looking forward in 1857 through the coming ten years, it would not have been thought extravagant to anticipate an increase equal to the average of the previous thirty years. What would any of us have then said had it been predicted that in 1867 our foreign commerce would show for the last ten years not a gain of fifty-one per cent., but a loss of fifty per cent.? Let us see how much this difference really is between what in 1857 would not have been an unreasonable anticipation and the actual truth:

In 1857 our foreign tonnage was.....	2,377,094
Add fifty-one per cent. for the average growth per decade from 1827 to 1857.....	1,212,318

Our tonnage might have been expected to reach in 1867.....	3,589,412
Our actual tonnage in 1867 was.....	1,178,715

Showing a difference of..... 2,410,697 or sixty-seven per cent., and leaving our tonnage in 1867 just one third of what in 1857 we should have been justified, by past experience, in estimating that it would be. In these last calculations we make no allowance whatever for the new system of admeasurement.

"These are the figures, and they need no comment. They are disheartening enough; but they must be looked at and understood in all their significance if we would endeavor to reach a remedy."

Now, then, let us look at the relative loss. I have shown you what the actual loss has been, and how that in a few years tending in that line the time would come when our foreign commerce would be swept from the ocean.

Mr. HARDING. I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether this decline in our tonnage is not mainly due to the fact that we have been engaged in a war?

Mr. ELIOT. That is a very proper question, and I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that beyond controversy that fact has operated very largely; it has probably tended directly to affect some five hundred thousand tons of tonnage, but that does not account or begin to account for the condition of things existing now. Put us as we were before the war, and it would require but a very short time for the tonnage which was lost because of the rebellion to be replaced. It was in a favorable condition before the war, and the shipping interest did not require drawbacks. I will say to my friend that if he will give his vote and influence to this bill it will be entirely satisfactory to me to have him offer an amendment that the provisions of this bill shall cease and expire within six months after the resumption of specie payment.

Mr. MILLER. I would like to ask the gentleman whether, if this bill passes, it will not be the means of breaking up many of the manufactories of the United States?

Mr. ELIOT. No; I think the energetic men of Pennsylvania will not be injured. While they have such persistent and able men upon the floor of Congress as they have now, my friend need not fear.

Mr. MILLER. Then we must stop this free-trade movement.

Mr. ELIOT. We did suppose before 1861 that the time was at hand when we should be able to equal upon the seas our greatest foreign rival. In 1861, as I have stated, our tonnage reached the point of 5,539,813 tons. At that time Great Britain had a tonnage of 5,800,000 tons. That is to say, she had 260,187 tons more than we had. So rapidly were we drawing up with her that it would have taken but a few years for us to equal her. Why, one single ship-yard in my own State in the course of ten years alone would turn that difference of tonnage. Donald McKay, if business were as it had been before 1861, could turn out his dozen ships, averaging some twenty-five thousand tons a year, and could himself have brought up the tonnage of this country to that of Great Britain.

In 1866 England had 7,366,808 tons, while we had 3,868,615 tons. That is to say, in that short time, instead of being 260,000 tons short of England, we were less by 3,488,193 tons, and to-day the difference is greater. I have given the condition of English tonnage in 1866. I have not the returns for 1867. I have given you our condition in 1867.

Now, sir, it is manifest enough that if Congress does not interfere to rescue this commerce of ours, which is failing, we shall be driven from the ocean. We cannot compete with foreign Powers. We must yield at once and let England rule the seas. In 1860 our foreign trade equalled in money $663,000,000. Of that our own ships had $443,000,000, and foreign vessels $220,000,000. In 1866 that same trade equalled $866,000,000; and of that our ships had $262,000,000, and foreign ships $604,000,000; and at this rate, in a few years, our whole foreign commerce would be carried on in British bottoms. From a statistical table recently furnished by our consul at London to the Department of State, it appears that in 1861 one third of the carrying trade of the whole world was by our vessels.

In 1866 our vessels had less than one sixth of that carrying trade, showing the rapid decline in that direction, while British vessels in 1866 had more than one half of that trade.

One other fact which speaks as loudly to the House as perhaps any fact can. In 1861 four hundred and seventy-two American ships entered the port of London; in 1866 only seventy-one American vessels entered that port. That is going pretty near the bottom line. And if we go much further, as I said just now, it will be too late to legislate to revive this trade; we should have to recreate.

The object of this bill is to put strength in the hands of the men who build up the navy of the country, that our commercial marine may live and not die. Is there any American who wants to see this state of things continue? I should like to appeal to the West on this question, not because it is an eastern interest, because it is not; it is a national interest, if ever any interest upon the face of the earth can be national. I want to appeal to the West on that ground.

It has been my fortune in this House and in committee to contend as earnestly as I could and as long as I might for those measures which seemed to them to be especially important for them; not because they were important alone for them, but because I believed that the proposed legislation was of importance to the whole land. Why, sir, what is the national advantage of the immense agricultural resources of the West if you cannot get your agricultural products to market? And so we have been trying to aid in the opening of river and harbor accommodations, so that those who are able to supply the granaries of the world might be permitted to leave their own homes and find a market for their products. And they do not want to go to that market in foreign vessels. They do not want to make it necessary that every bushel of grain that goes from New York across the ocean—nay, that which goes from the West to New York city, shall go in foreign vessels. I apprehend they will not be willing to submit to that humiliation.

Now, while we know perfectly well that all during our past life as a nation our flag upon the ocean has been our glory; while we know that the time is at hand when that flag will have to be struck, not to a foreign foe, but to that legislation at home against which it cannot stand, I will ask the West as well as the East whether it is not for their common interest that a remedy should be found. With fair play we can rival the world.

There is not only no nation upon earth that so prostrates its maritime interests, but there is no country upon earth where at home an interest is so prostrated as is this shipping interest of ours in this country and by ourselves.

Mr. FERRISS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ELIOT. Certainly.

Mr. FERRISS. I would inquire whether the change in the relative amount of the tonnage of Great Britain and this country is not entirely the result of the war?

Mr. ELIOT. All through the war it was right and proper that such taxation should be proposed as would enable the Government to raise money to pay the war debt. Of that taxation the shipping interest has borne more than its share; we do not complain of that. Beside, and independent of that, the difference between the prices of imported articles which go into the construction of ships now and before the war is more than one hundred and one per cent. And the difference thus made has been just enough to disable entirely the shipping interest from going on.

Now, we do not come into this House and ask for legislation which does not find acceptance in other portions of the world in this exact direction. What do you suppose would be thought of any man who would get up in the Parliament of Great Britain and propose to subject the shipping interest to the customs duties borne by the shipping interest of our country? They go further than this bill proposes to go. They not only remit the duties on all the articles which go into the construction of their vessels, but they remit the duties on the outfit, provisions, and everything in any way connected with the vessel and the conducting the voyage.

Mr. O'NEILL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts who has charge of this bill to turn his attention to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] relative to drawback upon American lumber, copper, cordage, chains, and anchors used in ship-building.

Mr. ELIOT. I cannot do that now.

Mr. O'NEILL. I hope the gentleman will give his attention to that before he concludes his argument.

Mr. ELIOT. The gentleman will see that is in a different line of legislation from what is proposed in this bill. It is not bounty that is asked for in this bill.

Mr. O'NEILL. I merely wish to have the gentleman explain to the House whether in this indirect way to take off the duties on these American products would not be a protection to American manufactures? These interests being large, and especially in the State of Pennsylvania, I should like to have his views on the amendment which I trust the House will pass at the proper time.

Mr. ELIOT. Now, suppose we continue this policy a little longer, what will be our condition in case of war? Since the rebellion closed we find that we have few ships of our own upon the ocean. From the city of New York, from the cities of Philadelphia and Baltimore, from the city of Boston, from all along the Atlantic coast where foreign commerce is carried on, the time will come that the property transported abroad will wholly go in foreign ships. Well, sir, let that time come, as come it will. In the mean time the ship-yards are dismantled and capital turned from that into other channels. Now comes war. How long are we to be without a war? Who can tell? During this last war who can estimate the value of our Navy—a war at home, a war with rebellion, a war not making it needful to fight our battles mainly on the ocean, a war not calling upon us for a large naval fleet to do our fighting for us. Suppose a foreign war comes, I ask honorable gentlemen of the West how are they to build ships? Do they expect it is possible to extemporize a navy then when we have none of our own? We had in 1861. We had, moreover, appliances and means to build vessels. As they were wanted and as fast as they were wanted they were turned out for the Government.

How shall we conduct the next war when it comes? The question gives its own answer. It cannot be done. This is not a question for the eastern Atlantic shore, for the eastern part of this land; it is a question for the whole country, if there can be such question propounded to Congress.

I have here a letter from Donald McKay, a ship-builder of East Boston, one of the largest and most successful ship-builders we have. Let me read it:

EAST BOSTON, February 15, 1868.

Editor of the Traveler:

Within the last few months several conventions have been held in different parts of the country, and the cause of the depression of the mechanical and manufacturing interests has been fully discussed, and suggestions have been made for the relief of these suffering branches. As yet no meeting has been held—with one exception in Maine—to consider the cause of the almost complete stagnation of the ship-building interest, and present the fact to Congress that severe taxation is the principal cause of such great depression, and asking for relief. The United States ship-builder cannot compete in the construction of ships with his provincial neighbor until relief is obtained by having the burden of taxation removed. I have been endeavoring for several weeks, and without success, to find a sufficient number of ship-builders to sign a call for a meeting of discussion, and the feeling among those I saw was they had given ship-building up, and did not expect to ever lay any more keels. Most of these gentlemen have built thousands of tons of shipping, and employed thousands of men, and are well known to the mercantile community. Within a circuit of five miles I can count twenty ship-building firms who are now idle, and have been since the war, and most of them built from two to four ships annually before the war. For myself, I have constructed some years twelve tons, while at present I am engaged in building only a ship of twelve hundred and eighty-five tons, having already spent ten months time on her, and I cannot find a merchant who will buy her at her actual cost, not including therein my own services. The cause of this high cost is principally attributable to enormous taxation, and a consequent high cost of material and high rate of labor. While new ships continue so costly but few merchants will invest in them, because they can place their money in United States bonds, free of taxation, which will pay higher interest than they can receive from shipping.

I annex a list of duties (in gold) upon various articles entering into the construction of a new ship of one thousand tons:

Iron, 120,906 pounds.....	$1,209 06
Iron spikes, 9,983 lbs.....	249 15
Galvanized spikes, 2,409 lbs.....	60 23
Castings, 14,408 lbs.....	216 12
Chain cables and rigging chains, 58,300 lbs.....	1,457 50
Anchor, 10,700 lbs.....	240 75
Metal and nails for do., 20,338 lbs.....	711 83
Salt, 1,200 bu.....	216 00
Manilla, 12,423 lbs.....	310 57
Hemp, 28,774 lbs.....	863 22
Duck for sails and house tops, including spare sails, 7,150 yds.....	714 90
Clutch rings, 1,500 lbs.....	36 00
Foreign white pine lumber and decking.....	825 00
Foreign hackmatack knees.....	330 00
Copper bolts, composition, castings, paints, oils, crockery, cabin trimmings, nails, and sundry outfits.....	1,225 00

Total dutiable articles for 1,000 ton ship, (gold).....$8,665 33

As a partial relief to the ship-building interest I would suggest that Congress permit a drawback of duties paid on materials entering into the construction of new vessels, (which at the present date on a one thousand ton ship proves to be between eight and nine thousand dollars, as shown above), and this privilege is accorded to the ship-owners and ship-builders of Great Britain, enabling them to compete with all other commercial nations, and their drawback extends to all articles of construction, equipment, and stores used in building and fitting out of new vessels.

Interested persons can obtain from the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, for purposes of comparison, the register amount of tonnage built each of the past twenty years. There have been so few vessels built for our merchants in recent years that the average age of American sea-going ships is over ten years, and on this account our insurance companies meet with many losses, and yet the shipowner now pays double the old rate of marine insurance.

DONALD McKAY.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how is the Treasury to be affected by passing this bill? If ships are not constructed then no revenue can be derived from the material which enters into ship-building. If vessels are not built the articles will not be imported. No duties are to come if the articles are not used. Therefore remitting the duties, while it invites importation so far as is needed, does not affect the Treasury one dollar, because, whether the bill passes or does not pass, the Treasury cannot be affected. Of course I am now assuming that no ships are built. If a few should be under the present law at such losses as would be borne because of an unwillingness entirely to give up the pursuit, or of an inability, perhaps, to enter on some other, the Treasury will be only to that extent affected.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the gentleman a question, if it will not disturb him in his line of argument. It seems to me that a part of the explanation of the falling off of our tonnage is due to the fact that steam tonnage has largely taken the place of sail tonnage. I do not know what the ratio is between a ton of steam tonnage and a ton of sail tonnage.

Mr. ELIOT. It hardly will tend to an explanation, I think, because the rapidity with which a steamer moves enables it to make several voyages to and fro where a sailing vessel does one.

Mr. GARFIELD. Therefore, I suggest the inquiry whether our present tonnage is not as efficient an instrument of commerce as our tonnage of ten or fifteen years ago was, when a very large proportion of our vessels were sailing vessels, whereas it is now very rapidly becoming changed in its proportions, so that a much larger ratio is steam tonnage. Therefore we have an effective tonnage which is much greater than appears in the reports of commerce and navigation, and it may be that our commerce has more nearly recovered from its depression than the returns would indicate. I do not suggest this as explaining all the depression, but as an important element in the calculation.

Mr. ELIOT. There is no doubt that to a certain extent the suggestion is well founded. It is true that for some years past steam tonnage has been taking the place measurably of sail vessels, but this is for certain purposes and in certain trades. Besides, we have no steamships, or very few, in foreign commerce. The steamers that ply between this country and Europe are now foreign built and foreign owned.

I have stated that Great Britain refuses to impose upon her interests the burden with which we have crushed the shipping interest of this country. I do not mean to say that the legislation proposed can at once enable the shipping interest to take the position it held some years ago, but I do say that until we return to specie payment, until prices are natural and labor becomes better regulated, some legislation like this is absolutely needful to rescue from destruction the interest of commerce. The relief can be withdrawn at any time. The shipping interest asks for no bounty at the hands of Congress. They simply assert that the commercial marine must go out of existence, and submitting the facts to the House they ask whether we are willing that the time shall come when the mercantile navy and marine of the United States shall cease to exist, when the stars and stripes will remain at home, the bunting folded up and stored away in the upper rooms of their owners' houses, and the British flag shall float over all the seas?

There are several sections of this bill to which I have not particularly alluded; nor do I desire to unless information is wanted by the House. In regard, however, to the last section, I wish to say this: in 1852 there was a law passed authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue American registers to foreign-built vessels which were wrecked on our coast and when they were condemned as wrecks, purchased by Americans, and rebuilt at an expense of three fourths of the value of the property. In the course of the administration of that law it came to pass that a wreck occurred on our coast of a foreign vessel which had been owned for many years in a foreign land, but which had originally been built in this country. The Attorney General, on examining the law, decided that the spirit of the law justified the Secretary of the Treasury in issuing an American register to the vessel, although the words of the statute were "foreign-built vessel." But since then the construction has been different, and a vessel built in this country, although it may have been owned for very many years by foreigners, if wrecked on our coast, could not be purchased except for old material, to be broken up and consumed; it could not be rebuilt, because under the law it could not be registered as an American vessel. The only effect of this section is to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury in cases of that kind to issue registers to vessels actually built in America, provided they were not transferred to foreigners during the war.

Mr. MILLER. I would ask the gentleman what the provisions of law are which the third section repeals?

Mr. ELIOT. The act of July 31, 1792, concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels, requiring oaths to be filed in the custom-house by every owner, whenever transfers were made of ownership. It is a law that has not been for many years enforced, and which it would be almost impossible fairly to enforce without great burdens to the shipping interest. We therefore recommend that it shall be repealed.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] called my attention to an amendment offered by his colleague, [Mr. MORRELL.] That amendment is that for the encouragement of American iron, lumber, copper, and manufactures, there shall be allowed bounties upon articles used in the construction of ships to the same extent as the drawback would be if those articles were imported. I have only to say that it did not seem expedient for the shipping interest to be placed in the position of a party asking bounties. We have had in New England too much opprobrium and reproach because of bounties which at last were repealed at the instance of the men who received them. On your files the first petition from parties interested for the repeal of the fishing bounties came from Provincetown, at the end of Cape Cod, in my district, signed by the parties who were supposed to be benefited. We do not want bounties, and therefore no provision of that sort was inserted in the bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLAIR. I would not venture to intrude at all upon the time of the House if it were not that a very great interest in my State is deeply affected by this bill. I do not say by any means that that ought to defeat the bill; but I do say that it requires consideration of the House before they shall adopt this measure. I listened attentively to the speech of the gentleman who reported this bill from the Committee on Commerce, as I did also to the labored argument of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] the other day upon the same question. I hear from both these gentlemen that the ship-building interest of the country is greatly oppressed and requires relief. I have listened for the purpose of ascertaining, if I could, what it is that so oppresses that interest. What is the difficulty? Have we changed the laws in any such way that we have oppressed this interest? Is it by an act of Congress passed within the last five or six years that this interest has been cast down? Do gentlemen tell us what it is that is the difficulty here? I want to know, before they ask me to apply the remedy they seek, what is the injury? I desire that these gentlemen shall tell us what it is that has oppressed this interest. They can hardly expect that we shall be able to apply the remedy unless we understand the disease. I think the law remains as it has been for a long series of years on this subject. We have not interfered, at least against the shipping interest, in any way to my knowledge. I do not understand the gentleman to claim that that has been the case.

Nevertheless, it is said that this interest is oppressed very greatly. Well, sir, I think I might answer that by the question, is that the only interest in this country that is oppressed? Why, sir, we hear here every day that almost all the great interests of the country are oppressed and ruined. One gentleman tells us that the iron interest is cast down; another says that the coal-oil interest is languishing; and so, if you run through almost the entire list of the great interests of the country, you will hear that there is oppression upon them. It is certainly true that many great interests of the country are in a degree oppressed, but that, sir, grows out of the condition of the country, and I must insist, unless gentlemen can show that there is some other reason, that in regard to the ship-building interest the reason is precisely the same.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield to me to allow me to make a report from the Committee on Reconstruction? The committee have instructed me to report back the amendment of the Senate to the bill to relieve citizens of North Carolina of disabilities, with the recommendation that it be disagreed to. I desire to make the report, and ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. BLAIR. I will yield for that purpose.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The Committee on Reconstruction, which is authorized to report at any time, have instructed me to report back Senate amendment to House bill No. 1059, to relieve certain citizens of North Carolina of disabilities, and to recommend that the amendment be non-concurred in, and that a committee of conference be asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman admit an amendment to correct a name in the Senate amendment? The name "John D. Ashmond" should be "John D. Ashmore," of South Carolina.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. That can be done by the committee of conference.

Mr. BROOKS. I think it would be well to have the Senate amendment printed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. We can do very well without that.

The motion to non-concur in the amendment of the Senate and ask for a committee of conference was agreed to.

The SPEAKER subsequently appointed Mr. FARNSWORTH, Mr. PAINE, and Mr. BECK as the conferees on the part of the House.

PROMOTION OF AMERICAN COMMERCE.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 929) to promote American commerce.

Mr. BLAIR. I feel justified in saying that it is not sufficient, when asking for extraordinary remedies for particular interests, to say that to some extent they are languishing at this time. That is a common complaint, one which applies quite as much to other interests as to this one.

Now, sir, taking for granted, for the sake of argument, all that has been said concerning this special ship-building interest, what is the remedy which this bill proposes? And I may be allowed to say that, as I understand, this bill comes here upon its own merits alone; it does not have the sanction of the Committee on Commerce as a committee, but the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] is allowed to report it to the House; as I am informed the Committee on Commerce has not committed itself to the measure. What is the remedy that this bill proposes? It consists of five sections, the first of which provides—

That section four of an act entitled "An act amending certain acts imposing duties upon foreign importations," approved March 3, 1865, and section fifteen of an act entitled "An act increasing temporarily the duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved July 14, 1862, be, and the same are hereby amended so that the tonnage tax therein imposed shall be collected only from vessels arriving from foreign ports.

I see no objection to that section, and do not intend to make any contest upon it. Neither do I think it is a matter of so great importance that this bill should be passed on that account. The third section of this bill provides:

That the fifth section of an act entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels," approved December 31, 1792, is hereby repealed.

That has reference, I understand, solely to registering and recording of vessels. The fourth section of this bill provides—

That hereafter boats or other vessels of the United States less than twenty tons burden shall not be enrolled, and no certificate of registry shall be required of them. Such boats or vessels shall be licensed, and shall in every other respect be liable to the rules and regulations and penalties now in force relating to registered and enrolled vessels.

This, I presume, is all very well; but it certainly cannot particularly relieve the ship-building interest of the country at large. The fifth section provides—

That the provisions of the act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue registers to vessels in certain cases," approved December 23, 1852, are hereby extended to vessels built within the United States: Provided, That the same were not transferred during the rebellion to foreign owners.

Now, in all these four sections I find nothing that can very materially aid the ship-building interest. I conclude, therefore, that the sum of the great benefits that are to be derived from this bill are to be found in the second section, which provides—

That a drawback equal to the duties paid be allowed to ship-builders on lumber, cordage, iron, copper, chains, and anchors actually used and employed by them in the building and rigging of any ship, steamer, or other vessel built within the limits of the United States; the amount of drawback in all cases to be ascertained and paid in such manner and under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That five per cent. on the amount of all drawbacks so allowed shall be retained for the use of the United States by the collectors paying such drawbacks respectively.

This, then, is the main object of the bill: to allow a drawback upon copper, lumber, iron, cordage, chains, anchors, and the like. Now, in regard to the copper interest I believe I can speak as loud as any gentleman can in favor of the shipping interest, and, if I am not mistaken, with quite as much reason.

The copper mining interest upon Lake Superior—and I speak of that particularly because I happen to understand it better than I do any other copper mining interest—the copper mining interest upon Lake Superior has employed a capital of fully $50,000,000. In consequence of the closing of the war, and, I suppose, partially from the failure of the demand for copper, and still more because the protection upon that article is much less than upon most articles of the sort, that interest is at this time in a very depressed condition. The House doubtless has noticed the very large number of petitions which have come here from that interest for relief. They ask that the copper interest of the country shall be protected by duties somewhat corresponding to those which are applied to iron and other similar interests of the country. And by and by, when that bill shall be reached, we shall ask the House to consider the question whether this interest does not need protection.

It would be easy, and perhaps it would be well, to state more at large what this copper interest is. But I will not detain the House further than to say that the Lake Superior copper mines produce nine thousand of the twelve thousand five hundred tons of copper produced in this country. It is, therefore, a very important interest. I need not enlarge upon the fact that while this interest has been more developed in the mines of my State than elsewhere, it is nevertheless a vast and increasing interest all over the country.

What I wish to say here is, that I do not wish to make any point against the ship-building interest; while I will give my vote and voice in every case to aid that interest, so far as it may be possible, yet I cannot be asked here to strike down another of the great interests of the country. On the contrary, we must get on together. And I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, in all seriousness, that if he expects this to be a great nation commercially it must also be a great nation productively. It must take care of all of its interests at home as well as abroad. I tell him that he will never see the stars and stripes floating in triumph upon every sea all over the world if he strikes down our home interests in behalf of the ship-building interest.

Mr. PIKE. I wish to say, with the permission of the gentleman from Michigan, that the ship-building interest is a customer for Michigan copper to a very small extent. I have here a very carefully prepared table, showing the amount of duties collected on these various articles.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not yield for a speech, although I do yield for a question.

Mr. PIKE. At the proper time I will explain this matter to the satisfaction of the House.

Mr. BLAIR. I will say further in explanation of the objection I have to this bill, it grants a drawback on imported copper which is no more or less than taking the duty off copper and allowing it to come into competition with our home copper interest. When that is done I undertake to say it will destroy the copper mines of Lake Superior. It will admit foreign copper free.

Mr. LYNCH rose.

Mr. BLAIR. I suppose the gentleman expects to reply to me, and what he has to say I prefer he shall say then.

The gentleman from Maine says that the ship-building interest has not been a very large patron of the copper interest. That may be true; but my opinion was otherwise. It will result, if this be adopted, that the copper produced abroad will come in here free, and will be consumed by the ship-building interest to the extent needed. My opinion is, however, that copper is a material very largely used in ship-building. During the war the copper interest flourished largely, growing out of the fact that the amount of copper used had largely increased in consequence of the great number of ships that were then built.

Now, sir, the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE], who made an elaborate speech the other day, intends not only to antagonize this interest of copper, but to leave every other interest in this country unprotected. Let me read from the speech he made on that occasion:

"Mr. MYERS. If the gentleman will allow me, I do not know that I disagree with him in what he has said, but I do not like one of his arguments. Does he mean to tell this House and the country that the relief we have given from taxation is simply to certain rich manufacturers, and not to the laborers whom they employ throughout the whole country? If not, why does he use such an unnecessary argument here in behalf of a just bill?"

"Mr. PIKE. I made a statement that cannot be contradicted, that we relieved from taxation the rich manufacturers of the country. It cannot be denied that we have failed to relieve the humble interests of the country that I have described. I know the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MYERS]. It is familiar to me from my boyhood. It is that the incidental benefits that accrue to the manufacturer reach the employé. I have used that kind of argument ever since I learned to talk in public. I was a protectionist in my day, and I argued that in protecting the manufacturer we protected the employés; that manufacturing establishments would draw around them operatives who would receive the drizzle of protection that filtered through their employers. I am not so thoroughly imbued with the justice of that idea as I used to be."

I cannot understand the gentleman from Maine, Mr. Speaker, for he places the ship-building interest, or rather this bill, upon the ground distinctly that it is hostile to the protective policy of the country. He proposes to do that with that interest. I will not stop here to complain of the manner in which he treated this interest then. But if he used the language that he says he did he was much less of a protectionist than I supposed him to be. He says that he used the argument that, by protecting the rich manufacturers the poor people would have some little "drizzle" of that protection at the same time. I have been a protectionist all my life, and I say to the gentleman that I have never mentioned any such "drizzle" in any of my arguments. I refer to this solely for the purpose of showing that the gentleman was against this and the other great productive industries of the country. This Congress at least has long enough shown a disposition not to abandon that protective policy; hence I do not think it necessary to discuss it now.

I say, then, that the drawback is simply an infraction of the protective policy of the country. There is not an argument that can be used in favor of it which is not equally an argument for the abolition of the entire protective policy of the country. It strikes at that and nothing else. If it is best for the United States to foster its own industry, if it is best to take care of our own interests, then we cannot consistently pass this bill.

I will say further that I do not believe the passage of this bill is necessary. For when I look into the gentleman's figures which he took so much pains to arrange for our information, and see what the amount of tonnage was in 1861, as compared with the amount in 1867, it appears plain enough from those very tables that the ship-building interest has not suffered any more than the other great interests of the country. It is true that during the war, in consequence of the existence of confederate cruisers on the ocean, our ships were to a great extent driven from it, and the natural consequence is that as yet they have been unable to be replaced. The gentleman from Maine will understand, of course, that it takes some time to recover from this depression. There is no great interest that can be invaded and crippled in this way without some depression. But, sir, I have as much faith as I have in anything that the enterprise of the American people will remedy this evil as it has remedied similar evils before.

We have been a great commercial nation, and we shall continue to be such. I am not prepared as yet to shed any tears over the flags of my country that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Ellor] thinks will be carried into lofts and stowed away by and by while we mourn over the decadence of the power and glory of the American people. If you will take care of the great interests of the country at home I am willing to let foreign ships struggle for supremacy on the seas and fight the battle in their own way, believing that our flag will triumph there as it has in the great struggle for nationality.

I believe I have occupied the time of the House as long as I ought to on this subject. I repeat that my objection to this bill is simply that it undertakes to maintain this one interest by striking at another which is equally important, and we cannot afford to foster one interest by detriment to others of equal importance. I shall be glad to have the burdens of the country equalized, if they are not already equalized, but after the statements on the other side in favor of the bill I am not able to see that it is at all necessary that this measure should be passed. I intended to move as an amendment, before I sat down, to strike out a section of the bill.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order; the motion to recommit is pending.

Mr. BLAIR. I yield to my colleague, [Mr. Driggs.]

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to occupy the attention of the House but a short time, as my time is limited to the brief period yielded to me from his time by my colleague, [Mr. Blair], and as I have promised a portion of that time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Myers.] I desire to say that I understood my colleague, [Mr. Blair], in reply to Mr. Pike, of Maine, to say that that gentleman had stated—and which I had also understood him to say—that a very small proportion of the copper used in ship-building was obtained from Lake Superior. That statement, Mr. Speaker, I doubt not is strictly true, and for the very best reason it is true. The reason, sir, why our native copper is not used is because it has no protection, and these ship-builders find it much more convenient and economical to buy copper produced from foreign ores, the product of penal and cheap labor, brought into the country almost free and thrown into the market in ruinous competition with the production from the mines of Lake Superior and other sections, which are borne down by taxation of every kind to support the Government. If this bill passes, and a drawback is allowed to the ship-builder equal to the duty on foreign copper, it is very doubtful whether even the small proportion of which the gentleman speaks will come from Lake Superior or any other American mines; for it will be utterly impossible for them to compete with the foreign article imported free of duty.

I hold in my hand, and will send to the Clerk's desk to be read, a letter from a prominent ship-builder in Maine. This letter, I think, sir, will convince the gentleman, the House, and the country that he does not represent the entire wishes of the ship-builders of the country in urging this drawback of the duty paid on foreign copper. As the letter will show for itself what this intelligent ship-builder thinks of the proposition, I will suspend any further remarks until it is read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BATH, MAINE, March 21, 1868.

Sir: I take the liberty to write you on allowing a drawback on foreign materials used in the construction of vessels, as I am one of those who are opposed to the withdrawal of duties.

I have not written our Maine Senators, as they are committed to the friends of that measure. I will briefly state my reasons. In the first place, it would be unjust to those who have invested their money in ships, and the reduction of duties entirely would lessen the value of their property just so much as the drawback would amount to. We have built in the last four years four ships. The duties on the foreign articles in them would be about forty thousand dollars, and we should lose that amount, because the vessels would not sell for so much.

Another reason why there should be no encouragement of that kind is that there are more vessels now built, and being built, than are wanted.

The cotton crop is not half what it was before the war, when we had four million five hundred thousand bales. Ships will do well enough, and can afford to pay duties.

It seems to me nothing can be more suicidal than the course of the friends of this drawback.

It would be as though woolen manufacturers, whose interest is depressed, should ask Congress to take the duties from machinery or materials made abroad as a remedy for mills now idle, causing new mills to be built, because cheaper than the old ones. What ship-owners now want is profitable business for the vessels they now have, and then we shall have a healthy, not a hot-house, growth of ship-building. Much complaint has been made of the decrease of American commerce without cause.

A large number of vessels were sold during the war, and we got our money for them, and these vessels are now employed mostly in the same business that they would have been employed in under the American flag; and the cry that our commerce is dying out I think is only raised because many of those who have sold and now have their money in bonds wish to have the privilege of building ships cheaper than their neighbors, and when they can do it they will sell and go to building again. To-day American iron and chains are being used because they can be bought cheaper than the foreign article. Give a drawback, and every article that can be imported will be, and the home manufactures that depend on ships for their sale must stop. To show that ship-building is not quite dead there are now preparations being made to build on our river, the Kennebec, about fifteen ships and barks, averaging about one thousand tons each, and they will be built, duty or no duty; and if we cannot build them here they will be built in other places. The number of ships that will be built in this State the coming year I have no means of knowing, but I think it will be quite large, full enough for the prospect ahead. There was a time when I felt it would be well to have the duties removed, but on reflection I am convinced it will be better for all concerned that the duties remain as they are.

Respectfully, yours, L. W. HOUGHTON, of Houghton Brothers.

Hon. Z. CHANDLER.

P.S. In addition to other reasons why duties should not be taken off articles used in ship-building, we have a coastwise trade that foreign flags are not allowed to participate in; and should it be left to owners of vessels as a choice either to pay duties or allow foreign flags to be employed in our coastwise trade nine out of ten would prefer to pay duties.

* * * We had a short time since a meeting of ship-builders in our city on this subject of drawbacks, and I think not over half a dozen were present from outside the city, showing that there is little interest in the subject.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, that letter so fully expresses the whole question, and coming, as it does, from a ship-builder in the State of Maine, the gentleman's [Mr. Pike] own State, I shall say no more on the points to which it refers. While, as it has been said by the gentleman who preceded me, iron is protected by a duty of about fifty per cent., copper is only protected by a duty of five per cent. Sir, the people representing this once prosperous and now depressed American copper interest have been here for the last two years praying and begging Congress to save them from utter ruin by the imposition of a small increased duty. They have sent here numerous petitions, more numerous, as I believe, than has been done in reference to any other interest.

They do not ask that full protection given to other American productions; they only ask for twenty per cent. This, it is understood, the Committee of Ways and Means is unanimously in favor of giving them, and I earnestly believe the House will be in favor of conceding this eminently just claim as soon as that committee shall report the bill to the House for its action. The gentleman from Maine has stated that a very small amount of copper is used in ship-building. Mr. Speaker, this is either a very careless statement or my information is greatly at fault. I am informed by those who claim to know, and I believe it is true, that at least one third of all the copper used in the United States is for copper bottoms and for other necessary purposes in ship and steamboat building. And I will state another fact for the information of the House, and particularly for the gentleman from Maine, that the State of Michigan not only produces three fourths of all the copper used in the United States, but that it is capable of producing it all, and of exporting with proper protection an equal amount. Besides this, Mr. Speaker, the State of Michigan builds a greater amount of tonnage in ships and steamboats annually than does the State of Maine. But considering the vast national interest of copper they do not desire, any more than did the gentleman whose letter has been read, that one source of national wealth shall be ruined to build up another. In view of all these considerations and facts, it would not only be a manifest wrong, but an extreme cruelty, for this House to pass the bill introduced by the gentleman from Maine, for a drawback of the duties on the copper used in ship-building, and I earnestly trust that the House will not consent to so manifest an injustice, and that the bill will not pass. I regret that I have not more time to urge my objections, and that I must now yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Myers.]

Mr. MYERS. I have very little to say about this bill, but the mention of my name in connection with the debate the other day, and a few facts within my knowledge justify me in saying a few words in regard to it. Petitions are pouring in from all parts of the United States for an increased protection to American manufactures and American labor, and one member after another is presenting those petitions, and yet at this very time, apparently in a single interest and with no argument that it will benefit all interests, a bill is introduced very specious upon its face, but absolutely conflicting with all or most of those petitions.

I have no objection to the first section of this bill. There is none that I know of. But although I represent a ship-building interest, a district largely engaged in ship-building, there has come to me no voice in behalf of such a measure as this, although it has been published by the papers throughout the country. If any of my constituents who are engaged in ship-building desired such a measure, I believe I should have heard of it. I think that those I represent hold views similar to those expressed in the letter which has just been read at the Clerk's desk. If we could protect one interest without injuring others by this bill, I, for one, should have no objection to it. But, sir, I take it that in the section of country from which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Pike] comes there are some persons engaged in manufacturing chains; there are some persons engaged in manufacturing anchors; there are some engaged in manufacturing cordage; yet all those interests are to be stricken down, because as to them this measure is free trade. The drawback allows the ship-builder to import all these articles free of duty; that is, the duties are to be paid, but he gets them back. There are also manufacturers of machines and workers of iron that enters into the construction of vessels, to say nothing of the copper interest so ably represented by my friends from Michigan. Yet of all these interests are to a certain extent to be stricken down, without appearing to do so, by the second section of this bill.

If, Mr. Speaker, we may protect the ship-building interest in this way, why may not the same reasoning be applied to every other interest in the land which needs the same resuscitation? My district is, to a certain extent, a ship-building district, and the city I in part represent is a commercial city, and while to a certain extent commerce has declined, it has been because of causes beyond our control, because of the war. But, with proper energy and enterprise, such as that displayed at Baltimore, of which my friend from Maryland [Mr. Phelps] boasted the other day, our vessels will soon sweep across the ocean as they did before. I believe that ships will be built as enterprise is brought forward. I believe that this interest needs no more protection than other interests, and that no ship-builder would care to strike down these other interests merely for the sake of the benefit of the drawback herein provided.

What are we asked to do? For the sake of a certain number of ship-builders, in order that they may get their lumber and cordage and chains and anchors and their labor from Canada cheaper than they can now do, this provision is to be put upon the statute-book to the detriment of many other important interests of the country.

My friend from Maine, [Mr. Pike], in his speech the other day, spoke of our relieving the manufactures of the country. He spoke then of the necessity of passing this bill, though it had not then even been reported to the House. But I suppose he was anxious to speak upon it, and took that opportunity to do so, for fear another opportunity would not present itself. He referred to the fact that we had relieved certain people from taxation, and argued that we should therefore take off the tariff duties upon other articles. Now I want to say a word or two in reply to the gentleman from Maine, and other gentlemen who go with him in favor of this bill, and particularly of the principles contained in this second section.

Sir, before we took the tax off manufactures we relieved this ship-building interest by taking off the tax from everything that entered into ship-building. And I was one of the foremost in endeavoring to get that done, offering an amendment for that purpose. In reality we relieved the ship-building interest from taxation before we relieved the other interests. Therefore the argument of the gentleman made at any time is not a good one. That is all I have to say about that.

I wish to protect this interest, but I shall vote against this second section. If I cannot succeed in striking that section out I shall very gladly support the amendment of the gentleman from the Johnstown district of Pennsylvania, [Mr. MORRELL.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I would ask the gentleman if he is in favor of relieving the industrial interests of the country from the very heavy tariff they have been obliged to pay upon wood-screws, the patents for which we have been asked by the gentleman to extend? [Laughter.]

Mr. MYERS. I will answer the gentleman, although his question is not very relevant. Whenever he can show that the industrial interests of the country are unduly taxed in any way I will go with him to relieve them from taxation. And whenever I show him that any measure proposed here is one which will tend to oppress the industrial interests of the country I shall expect him to go with me in opposing it.

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, I presume it is hardly necessary to urge upon the attention of this House the great importance, the great national importance, of taking immediately some steps to regain the position which before the rebellion we held as a great maritime Power.

The truth of that wise saying of one of England's most sagacious statesmen, "that they who control the commerce of the world control the wealth of the world, and they who control the wealth of the world control the world itself," is, I think, too well appreciated here to need any argument from me to secure recognition. Sir, I take it that it is only necessary to ascertain what measures are needed to restore our lost commerce, and with it our lost advantage in the race for commercial supremacy in order to secure their adoption. While I do not believe in the policy of forcing into existence interests by governmental aid which can never stand alone, and which can only be sustained by the constant and continual support of the Government, I do believe it to be the true policy of every nation to aid, protect, and foster every great national interest that can by such protection and fostering care attain a position where it can sustain itself.

That the commercial interest of this country can become self-sustaining would not admit of a doubt, even if the fact had not been demonstrated by actual experience. A country abounding in all the material for the construction of ships, possessing a vast extent of seacoast, indented with the finest bays and harbors to be found in the world, that produces and consumes every article known to commerce, and is inhabited by as hardy and enterprising a race of men as ever peopled any country, has surely all the elements of a great commercial nation. It is only necessary to refer to the statistical tables to show the commanding position we had attained as a commercial nation prior to the recent great civil war through which we have just passed. The following table shows the relative increase of American and English tonnage in each decade from 1830 to 1860 inclusive:

Tonnage owned by the United States and Great Britain at different periods.

	U. S.	G. B.
1830.....	1,191,776	2,531,819
1840.....	2,180,764	3,311,338
1850.....	3,535,451	4,232,962
1860.....	5,353,868	5,710,968

Showing an increase of American tonnage in these thirty years of nearly three hundred and fifty per cent. to an increase of English tonnage of about one hundred and fifty per cent.

The following tables, covering the period from 1861 to 1866, inclusive, show a loss in American tonnage in six years of 1,043,090 tons, or about twenty per cent; while the tonnage of Great Britain in the same time increased 1,402,615 tons, an increase of about twenty-five per cent.

Tonnage owned by the United States and Great Britain at different periods.

	U. S.	G. B.
1861.....	5,539,813	5,895,369
1862.....	5,112,165	6,041,358
1863.....	5,128,081	6,629,403
1864.....	4,986,401	7,103,261
1865.....	5,096,781	7,322,604
1866.....	4,310,778	7,297,984

A comparison of the tonnage engaged exclusively in the foreign trade would show still more to our disadvantage; as the American tonnage engaged exclusively in the coastwise trade has during this period considerably increased.

Let us now see how we stand in relation to the carrying trade of the world. The following tables show the amount of American and foreign tonnage entering the ports of the United States from foreign countries in different years from 1830 to 1866:

	American.	Foreign.
1830.....	967,227	131,900
1840.....	1,576,946	712,363
1851.....	3,054,340	1,939,061
1860.....	5,921,285	2,353,911
1861.....	5,023,917	2,217,554
1862.....	5,117,685	2,245,278
1863.....	4,614,698	2,610,378
1864.....	3,066,434	3,471,219
1865.....	2,943,661	3,216,967
1866.....	2,886,060	4,410,424

The total foreign commerce at all the ports of the United States at three distinct periods before and since the war was in value, as follows:

Years.	In American vessels.	In foreign vessels.
1857.....	$405,485,462	$131,139,904
1860.....	547,247,757	255,040,793
1867.....	296,675,185	577,627,754

These tables show that while in 1860 we had engaged in foreign commerce to and from American ports more than double the amount of tonnage employed by all other nations, in 1866 the figures had become reversed, and the foreign tonnage engaged in this trade nearly doubled that of the United States, and that the amount in value of foreign commerce to and from American ports had fallen off in the same proportion.

A still more startling proof of the decadence of our influence in the foreign carrying trade is afforded by contrasting the business done by American, British, and French vessels between ports foreign to each class of vessels. In 1853 the American tonnage engaged in this trade was 4,004,013 tons to 3,363,121 British and 854,029 French, nearly as much as both put together. In 1860 the American tonnage was nearly six million to 4,700,000 British and 1,300,000 French, about the same proportion. In 1865 American tonnage had fallen to about three million tons, and that of Great Britain had risen to 7,000,000 tons. The following table from the reports of the Bureau of Statistics exhibits the figures in detail. I commence at 1853, for the reason that from 1849 to 1853 I find no statistics of the amount of British tonnage.

* In the official tables the American tonnage entering from foreign countries in 1853 is put down at 3,372,060; but this is the new measurement, which would be reduced fifteen per cent. to bring it to the old standard.

If anything further were needed to prove the disastrous effects of the war and taxation upon our shipping interests, it will be found by an examination of the subjoined tables of the value of the exports and imports carried in American and foreign bottoms in the foreign trade from 1850 to 1866:

Sir, no language of mine can add force to facts like these. They show conclusively that our foreign commerce has been nearly annihilated by the war in consequence of the inability of the Government to afford it protection. They furnish also a key to the motive that actuated foreign nations, particularly Great † Mixed gold and currency values in United States, mainly currency.

Britain, whose commercial rival we had become, in giving aid and comfort to the rebellion. Shall we allow those nations that aided in destroying our commerce to profit by its destruction? or shall we encourage and stimulate its reproduction by enacting wise and liberal measures in regard to it?

It is said that every interest in the country should bear its proportion of the public burden; and I fully concur in the general correctness of that proposition. But I submit whether this particular interest which has been crushed almost out of existence by the war, while those other great interests, agriculture and manufactures, have been stimulated and improved thereby, should not be made an exception to this general rule.

If an article of American manufacture is taxed, if the raw material which enters into its composition pays an impost duty, the article when manufactured is protected by a duty upon its foreign competitor, which is intended to cover not only these disadvantages, but also the increased cost of American over foreign labor.

And now I wish to call the attention of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] to the difference between the protection this great interest receives, and the protection which is afforded to the manufacturing interests which that gentleman represents. They are protected by the tariff which is put upon those articles that are included in our tax laws.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BLAIR] asked wherein our laws have been changed in regard to this ship-building interest that it now requires protection. I ask that gentleman and the gentleman from Pennsylvania wherein our laws have been changed in regard to the interests they represent? And yet those gentlemen, from the commencement of the war to the present time, have come here and demanded more protection, and we have given it to them. We have advanced the import duties pari passu with and in proportion as we have advanced our internal taxes. The laws in regard to the ship-building interest have not been altered to meet the altered condition of affairs, while the laws in regard to manufactures have been so altered.

Let us see how it is with the American ship-builder. He must build his ship with high-priced labor, and high-priced and high-taxed material; every thing from stem to stern, and from keelson to truck, has paid an excise or an impost duty. And when the ship is launched and ready for business, provisioned with taxed stores and manned with a taxed crew, the foreign ship, built with cheap labor, without a single article which has entered into her construction having paid a tax to the Government, with every article of ship stores exempt from duty, this ship, thus built, manned, and provisioned, hauls alongside of the American ship, at an American port, and enters into free competition with her for all foreign commerce. Is it strange, with this condition of things, that the American flag is fast disappearing from the ocean so far as foreign commerce is concerned? Is not the fact that it has held its own so well against such adverse circumstances conclusive proof that, with reasonable protection from the Government, we should soon regain all we have lost?

I would like to ask my friends from Pennsylvania, who are constantly asking for more protection—which I have always been willing they should have—how long they think they could stand the competition if it were possible for the Englishman to bring over here his rolling mill and machine-shops with workmen to run them; bringing at the same time provisions and clothing for the workmen; all free of duties or taxes; and then be allowed to sit down beside and enter into free competition with them? This, sir, is just what the English ship-builder is allowed to do in competition with the American ship-builder and ship-owner; and the present bill affords only a partial relief; because in the nature of the case only partial relief can be afforded. There ought to be a provision in the bill under consideration by which an American ship, clearing for a foreign port, should be allowed to take its stores as the English ship does, in bond, free of duty. The disadvantages which we labor under, of higher paid officers and crews to man our ships, is one under which we have always labored, but for which we have been compensated by the superior intelligence and enterprise of our officers and sailors. To show how rapidly, with reasonable encouragement and protection, our commerce can be restored, we have only to refer to the tables which I have presented, showing the increase of American as compared with foreign tonnage, and to the following table showing the amount of tonnage built each year from 1850 to 1866, inclusive:

*New admeasurement.

Statement showing the number and class of vessels built, and the tonnage thereof, in the several States and Territories of the United States, from 1850 to 1866, inclusive.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. With the permission of the gentleman, I would like to make an inquiry. I understood him to say that there is nothing in the materials of which the ship is built that is not taxed. Now, I ask him what there is that any laboring man in the West wears, from the crown of his head to the sole of his feet, or what there is that he uses, that is not taxed for the benefit of the manufacturer?

Mr. LYNCH. If the gentleman had listened to my argument he would have seen that I had already anticipated his question. While the late war nearly annihilated American commerce, it protected and stimulated the agricultural and manufacturing interests of the country; and to-day, with all the taxes that are placed on these interests, they are in a more thriving condition than they were before the war. And, let me tell the gentleman further, that by the repeal of the reciprocity treaty we have granted still further protection to the agricultural interest.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. We have borne the taxes which were put on in consequence of the enormous expenses of the war very cheerfully; but why should we have our taxes increased on every article which we consume, while these men ask to be relieved from the taxes imposed on their shipping interest?

Mr. LYNCH. I have already answered the gentleman's question, that those interests, notwithstanding the taxes imposed upon them, are, on account of the protection that was afforded and the stimulus given to all these branches of industry by the war, now actually better off than they ever were before, even when they paid no taxes, while the ship-building interest has been almost annihilated by taxation imposed without any compensating advantages, for the reason that you impose a duty upon everything that goes into the construction of the American ship, and then compel that ship to compete with the foreign-built vessel which is entirely exempt from all duties and taxes. There is no analogy in any other interest in the country. I defy the gentleman to point out any. Nowhere in the United States are the products of the foreign agriculturist allowed to compete free from tax or duty with the products of our own farmers; and thus protected by the Government the western farmers, represented by the gentleman from Wisconsin, are enabled to bear their portion of the burdens of supporting the Government.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I agree that the English ship should not be able to come alongside of our wharves, and be free from the taxation that our American ships have to endure. I agree that our ships should not be subject to this tax; but I object and protest against the discrimination the gentleman would make in favor of the ships and against our laboring men.

Mr. LYNCH. I do not agree with the gentleman in his free-trade notions, even if he agrees with me on this bill. I am in favor of protecting American labor and industry; but, as I have said before, all the other branches of American industry of which the gentleman speaks are better off to-day, even after paying the taxes, than before the war, because they have been stimulated and protected, while this ship-building interest is the only one which has had no protection, either from destruction during the war or from free competition with these untaxed foreign ships since.

Mr. O'NEILL. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. LYNCH. Yes, sir.

Mr. O'NEILL. I understand him to say he is in favor of protecting American industry in general. Is that so?

Mr. LYNCH. Yes, sir.

Mr. O'NEILL. Then, sir, I ask him just to look for one moment to the very practical amendment offered by my colleague, [Mr. MORRELL,] and say whether, in carrying out his idea of protecting American industry in general, he cannot vote for that amendment?

Mr. LYNCH. My answer to the gentleman is, as I have said before, that those interests are already very well protected by high duties. It is only a very small amount of articles represented by the gentleman that go into the construction of ships and that are proposed to be exempted under this bill. But these gentlemen from Pennsylvania are so grasping in this matter that, notwithstanding all the stimulus that has been given to their interests by the war and by a protective tariff, they are not willing to yield to the great national ship-building and ship-owning interests this small pittance that it asks and that it must have in order to live.

Mr. O'NEILL rose.

Mr. LYNCH. I decline to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania any further.

Mr. O'NEILL. Only one word.

Mr. LYNCH. I cannot yield.

Mr. O'NEILL. I wish merely to ask a question.

Mr. LYNCH. I will answer a question.

Mr. O'NEILL. I want the gentleman from Maine to answer me a question, and it is this: he speaks of the grasping of Pennsylvania after protection for all of her interests. Why, sir, Pennsylvania had to come here in the broad light of day and run her chances in a general tariff bill, and not by injecting into a bill, referring to some special interests, a few lines to do away with protective duties on many imported articles.

Mr. LYNCH. My answer to the gentleman is this: when the provisions of the drawback section of this bill were incorporated into the tariff bill in the last Congress and passed the Senate, these gentlemen from Pennsylvania came forward and demanded that it should be struck out. It was, in the Committee of Ways and Means, stricken out of that bill because of their opposition, and that is the reason why we are now obliged to bring it in by a special bill. It is because we cannot get in the general legislation the protection we need, on account of the gentleman and those who act with him.

Mr. O'NEILL rose.

Mr. LYNCH. I decline to yield further. Now, I wish to say a word in reference to another Pennsylvania interest which came here when we had a reciprocity treaty, which allowed us to bring coal from Nova Scotia free of duty. But a small quantity of that coal the statistics proved ever found a market west of New York, while but a very small quantity of the bituminous coal of Pennsylvania ever went east of New York. Yet, sir, these gentlemen come here and insisted that coal should have a high rate of duty put upon it, when it afforded no protection to them, because this Nova Scotia coal found its market principally east of New York and all the bituminous coal of Pennsylvania south of New York; so that they did not come into competition. Yet they came here and had a tax put upon that Nova Scotia coal, taxing New England manufacturers without deriving any advantage by way of protection to their bituminous coal.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me resume the course of my argument and recall attention to the table which I introduced just before I was interrupted by the gentleman from Wisconsin. A careful examination of that table will show that although we built nearly as much tonnage in some years during the war as before, it was mostly of a class suited to the internal navigation of the country, schooners, sloops, canal boats, and steamers, while the tonnage of the class suited to our sea-coast and foreign commerce, ships, barks, and brigs, built in that period, was comparatively small.

Now, sir, in order to foster our commerce we have to do something more than to lift from it the burdens which the war left imposed upon it. This interest has been crushed. It must be revived. Before the war it had no protection, enjoyed no exemption, and yet it grew and flourished. Revive it, build it up, place it on something like an equal footing with its foreign competitor, and it will again grow and flourish, increasing the wealth and power of the nation.

We are told by some that we should repeal our navigation laws, and buy instead of building our ships. The nation that builds ships owns them. If England builds our ships she will own them as she now owns nearly all the ocean steamers that do our carrying trade. But why should we buy ships when we have such facilities for building them that we can, as experience has proved, compete successfully with Great Britain and every other foreign nation in the carrying trade of the world. Are gentlemen willing to say to the American ship-builder, "You must pay an import duty on all the raw materials that enter into the construction of your ships, and build them with taxed labor, while the same materials, after having been wrought up into a ship in a foreign country, with foreign labor, may be admitted duty free." Do gentlemen seriously propose this discrimination against American labor and American capital? Great Britain allows her citizens to purchase and register foreign-built vessels; but she adopted that policy only after she had made her navigation interest strong by protecting it and relieving it of every burden of taxation. While she admits the free importation and registry of foreign ships, she admits free of duty every article which enters into the construction of her own ships. Give the American ship-builder ten years of such protection as the English ship-builder has enjoyed, and you may then admit foreign ships to American registry free, and he will not only protect himself but will drive the foreign ship-builder out of his own market.

I wish to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who asked if the introduction of steam navigation did not account for the falling off of our tonnage; this falling off being in consequence of the greater capacity and speed of steamers over sailing vessels. Does not the gentleman know that the whole ocean steam navigation is in the hands of foreigners? We have not a single line of steamships running in or out of an American port to or from any foreign port.

Mr. RANDALL. How does the gentleman propose to correct that?

Mr. LYNCH. By the passage of this bill as one of the measures, and I hope I shall have the gentleman's vote in its favor.

I am informed by a gentleman near me that there is a line of steamers running out of Baltimore. Those steamers were built abroad and sail not under the stars and stripes but under the union-jack.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. There is a line from California to Japan.

Mr. LYNCH. The gentleman says that there is a line from California to China and Japan. That may be the case. I think there is such a line, sustained by a large Government subsidy; but the gentleman very well knows that there was an attempted line from Boston to Liverpool, and that those vessels after two or three trips have come under the auctioneer's hammer, because they could not be sustained, being high-priced ships, with high-priced labor and high-priced provisions, while to their English competitors those articles have been free.

Mr. Speaker, a few days since there stood at the bar of this House the embassy of one of the oldest and most populous nations of the world. The chief and spokesman of that embassy claimed for the people of that nation the virtues of temperance, frugality, and industry, and a high cultivation and scientific attainments, and boasted that it could command the services of eighty million fighting men. And yet, sir, that great nation, great in its internal resources, in the extent of its territory, and in population, is scarcely a recognized Power among the nations of the world. While that nation from which we derive our origin, that little sea-girt isle which makes but a dot on the map of the world, with a commerce whitening every sea, has planted her flag in every quarter of the globe and laid the world under contribution to her aggrandizement.

Sir, the commercial greatness of England is the result of no lucky accident, but of sagacious statesmanship and wise legislation. The historian attributes it to the navigation laws passed by Cromwell's Parliament more than two centuries ago. May the future historian, be able to comment upon the commercial greatness, commercial supremacy, of our own country two centuries hence, and trace the source of that greatness, in part at least, back to the wise legislation of this Fortieth Congress, which has by its enemies been likened to that long Parliament of Cromwell.

I yield now to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS.]

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to say anything here upon the subject of the tariff upon copper or iron, but I shall ask the attention of the House, in the first place, to the necessity of protecting the shipping and commerce of the country. There are three great, prominent interests in all countries: commerce, agriculture, and manufacturing. Without dwelling upon which is the first of them, or attempting to classify them, it is admitted upon all sides that these are the three great interests; and although our agriculture and our manufacturing are in a high degree of prosperity, yet it is a fact that there is not now crossing the ocean under the American flag a single steamer, unless it be a small—and ragged line running occasionally from the city of New York, and an American line running from California to China and Japan, created and protected solely by the generosity of this Congress and sustained by a large bounty from the Government, without which it would be unable for a single hour to sustain our flag upon the ocean against the competition of France or of England.

Throughout all time and in all countries and in all periods of the world it has been the ambition of every nation first to protect its flag and to protect its commerce. Unless a nation is strong upon the sea, unless she presents a bold exterior front to all foreign nations, unless her harbors and rivers are protected by her navy, unless her flag floats in triumph over the ocean, no matter what may be her power on land—even though she have eighty million men in arms like China—yet she is a weak and powerless nation if she be without a wide and well protected commerce on the seas. This, as has been said by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. LYNCH,] is the history of the British nation. It rose from an insignificant Power occupying a little island in the ocean, without authority or dominion, to the conquering and subjugation almost of the whole world to its flag. It first rose from that insignificance purely and solely by the influence of its navigation laws. Those laws monopolized for English commerce its coastwise trade and forced its manufactures, its imports, and its exports into its own bottoms under its own flag. Those wise laws of Cromwell were maintained and defended throughout all time till Britain obtained the mastery of the seas by which she achieved her power.

And hitherto it has been our policy in this country, in like manner, to protect our flag. For that purpose we have secured to our commerce, against all foreign intervention, the whole coastwise trade of this country. No vessel under the British, French, or Danish flag can leave New York and go around Cape Horn to California or anywhere on the Pacific coast. There is no interference in that trade on the part of foreigners, because, in imitation of the laws of England, we have preserved to our own people the control and domination of our own coast trade under our own flag. For this purpose we have erected light-houses along our coasts and given bounties to our sailors. For this purpose, for the protection of our fisheries mainly as a nursery for seamen, we have once, if not twice, gone to war with the strongest Power in the world.

But we have now arrived at a new period in our history. We are now unable to compete with foreigners hardly out of sight of our own harbors, except as we have the monopolizing protection of our own coastwise laws. No American flag over an American steamer can now float upon the ocean, unless protected by an American bounty, in competition with steamers under British or French flags. It is a mortifying spectacle, to be daily and hourly witnessed in New York, of the flags of England, France, and the nations of the north of Europe floating over ships that bring our own people and our own commerce and trade from abroad to our own ports, while they are reaping all the profits of that carrying trade.

Mr. HIGBY. Will the gentleman say how he would help that; whether by subsidies, or by taking the tariff duties off these articles?

Mr. BROOKS. I will reach that presently.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If the gentleman will allow me, I would like to ask him why it is that the English are able to build ships so much cheaper than we can?

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman is roguish and mischievous, and wants to involve me in a discussion of the tariff question. I will not answer him just now.

The system of drawbacks proposed by this bill is nothing new in the history of our commerce. The manufacturers of New England now have on their cotton goods exported just what the ship-builders of Maine are asking, a drawback upon those articles upon which internal taxes and duties have been levied. Whatever cotton goods manufactured in this country are exported to the Indies, to Smyrna, to South America, receive in the port of export the benefit of the drawback, and just the same benefit is exacted which the commerce of Maine now demands.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. Is the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] in favor of the three cents per pound drawback on cotton goods?

Mr. BROOKS. I am not to be led off from my line of argument by mischievous questions of that kind put by my friends on this side of the House.

Mr. DRIGGS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. BROOKS. Very well.

Mr. DRIGGS. When the gentleman states that the commerce of Maine asks for this drawback upon materials used in ship-building, how does he reconcile that statement with the statement of the gentleman whose letter I had read at the Clerk's desk a few moments ago?

Mr. LYNCH. If the gentleman from New York will allow me, I will say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Driggs] that the letter he had read was not from a ship-builder but from a ship-owner, who does not want ship-building materials exempt from duty, because then ship-builders will build cheap ships to come in competition with the ships he owns. If I am not mistaken he has sailed his vessels under a foreign flag, and has a branch of his house at Liverpool.

Mr. DRIGGS. That gentleman says that a convention of ship-builders resolved that if these drawbacks are allowed it would decrease the value of all the shipping interest of this country.

Mr. LYNCH. The gentleman is mistaken; there has been no such action by any convention of ship-builders in this country.

Mr. BROOKS. What the people of Maine really want they will make known through their Representatives upon this floor, and their Senators in the other branch of Congress. The very fact that the letter referred to was written to a Senator from Michigan, and not to a Senator from Maine, shows that the writer of it does not represent the people of Maine in that respect. He says that upon four ships he has paid $40,000 tax to the Government, or an average tax of $10,000 per ship. I call the attention of gentlemen to the enormity of that tax. I ask gentlemen to say how the sailors of our country, how the commerce of our country, to say nothing of the flag of our country, can compete with ships and sailors from the ports of northern Europe, if they have to pay this tax? It is the enormity of this tax that has driven our ships off the sea as well as our steamers. It is the enormity of this tax which concentrates in New Orleans and Mobile and Charleston the fleets of all Europe to export our own cotton, tobacco, and rice from those ports. It is so much taken from the commerce of this country.

Mr. DRIGGS. These drawbacks are so much taken from the other industries of the country.

Mr. BROOKS. Now, sir, I wish to say that this system of drawbacks is not a new thing. It is part of our warehouse system. We are constantly importing goods into the country which are put into warehouses. If they do not enter into the consumption of this country, but are taken out of the warehouses and exported, drawback is allowed upon them. But, sir, the difference between this and the other manufactures of the country is this: when an American ship leaves an American port and ventures out upon the wide seas, upon the Atlantic or the Pacific, toward the East Indies or into the China sea, from that moment she is not like a manufacture here at home, protected as the manufactures here are from thirty to three hundred per cent. against manufactures elsewhere, but she is an American manufacture floating upon the high seas in competition with all the world. Her labor and industry are under our flag there upon the high seas coming into competition with all the other nations of the earth.

Mr. HARDING. I hope the gentleman will give us some information. I desire to ask him why this American steamship line which got up a trade between the United States and Japan, having a capital of some forty-five million dollars, is able to continue its business and to hold the exclusive possession of that trade?

Mr. BROOKS. I will answer the question again, and I hope the gentleman will give me his attention. That Pacific mail steamer is protected by the coasting-trade laws. None but the American flag can go from New York to Panama, and from Panama to San Francisco. None but American bottoms can carry American goods. That is a protection in the first place. In the second place that line has a large monthly subsidy from the Government.

Mr. BLAINE. Five hundred thousand dollars a year for ten years.

Mr. BROOKS. It has a bounty of $5,000,000 in ten years, and beside it has no competition with other flags or other steamers.

Mr. HARDING. I understand that England pays subsidies to her line.

Mr. BROOKS. Not the California line.

Mr. HARDING. The line I refer to traverses the Pacific ocean to China.

Mr. BROOKS. From San Francisco to Japan. That is the line which has a subsidy from the Government of $500,000 a year for ten years, making $5,000,000.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope my friend will not consider me as intruding upon him, but I would ask if it would not be a good speculation for our Americans who are building ships to go to England and buy them?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It seems to me that would be a good plan.

Mr. BLAINE. And not leave a sailor in this country who could lay the keel of a single vessel.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. We could get plenty of sailors by giving fishing bounties.

Mr. BROOKS. If I ever indulged in rhetorical declamation upon the floor of this House, if I was ever given in any degree to any display of oratory, as I am not, I would ask the House to forget for one moment every pecuniary consideration, everything relating to party, and to reflect solemnly upon the indispensable necessity of maintaining our flag upon the ocean. First and foremost of all things I repeat that in our contest with foreign nations unless our ships and sailors are protected and maintained, unless the people of Maine, the great nursery of seamen, are sustained in their interests, unless the people of the lakes are sustained in their interests in competition with the people on the other side, that people, that labor, and those seamen must suffer in competition with all others.

I speak, then, not for the interest of copper or iron, not for tariff or anti-tariff, but for the great, I may say the predominant, interest of our country, and that is the protection of our flag and the nursery of our seamen, without which and without the passage of a bill something like this, our commerce must decline more and more and our flag fade away from the ocean day by day, until, sooner or later, under the existing system, with the enormous pressure of the existing tariffs, you will soon cease to see passing coastwise from New York to Savannah or New Orleans or California, not only the American flag on the ocean, but even an American sailor. You will soon cease to see your flag on the ocean at all, unless it is protected by your legislation. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. PIKE. I yield a moment or two to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the grounds for this exceptional legislation are, as I understand, as follows: first, that the great shipping interest of the country, unlike any other interest, was, during the war, wiped out and destroyed, and, as a consequence, the carrying trade of the country has fallen into the hands of that country by whose perfidy our commerce was brought low; second, that by reason of the war and our inflated currency consequent thereon, with the high internal taxes, high wages, and the high price of articles entering into a ship, it is impossible to build and sail an American ship in competition with a foreign ship; and that, in point of fact, no ships bearing the American flag are now seen in foreign waters, and very few new ships are being built or can be built. In the cities of New York and Boston there is not a single ship on the stocks. I believe both these statements are true. I am unwilling to see Great Britain longer reap the harvest of her perfidy without at least making an effort to restore our ancient supremacy on the sea. To do so will, in my judgment, strike down no other interest. We build no ships, and we can under existing laws, build none. Consequently the Michigan copper derives no benefit from ship-building, and cannot be injured if we pass this bill. Anxious to see our flag once again floating upon the ocean, and believing that this bill will greatly tend to that result and injure no other interest of this country, I shall vote for it.

Mr. DRIGGS. That is a very pretty little speech if it was all correct; but as it is not it does not amount to much. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPALDING. Allow me to say that I adopt the speech of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WASHBURN]; and for the same reasons that he gives I shall vote for the bill.

Mr. PIKE. I am very glad to hear from the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] upon this measure, which is one of great importance not only to my constituents but it seems to me to the nation at large. And I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] for so succinctly stating the reasons why this legislation should be adopted. I stated at some length the other day—I do not propose to repeat the statement now in detail—that American commerce is in a most languishing condition. I gave a table of statistics from the Treasury Department exhibiting the statistics of our commerce before the war and its position now. Those statistics are not denied or controverted by anybody. I showed that while other interests were flourishing during the war and are now in the main in thrifty condition, this great national interest was stricken down, so much so that there is scarcely in any foreign port to-day an American flag to be seen.

One of our shipmasters, returning from a voyage to Calcutta the other day, says that on his voyage there and back he spoke but two American ships. And last week a naval officer told me that in the great highway between this country and Europe, as he sailed from Annapolis to France and back again last year, he scarcely met an American ship on the voyage, but those he did speak were vessels bearing the cross of St. George. And so it is everywhere. Go to the ports of the West Indies, where we formerly did the whole trade of $60,000,000, and to-day we are doing less than half of it. Go to the ports of South America, where we formerly did eleven parts of the trade, England one, and now there are three British ships to one American. These trades are not carried on by steam, as gentlemen suggest, but by sailing vessels. The various trades of the country are filled to repletion with British vessels. And the question now for you, gentlemen, to determine is whether or not you will, as an American Congress, render some assistance to American shipping? There is no other measure that you can place upon your statute-book except this that will be of any benefit to them.

I have studied this whole question with diligence, quickened by the interests of my constituents, and I can devise no measure except this. If you strike at this, you strike the last blow at American commerce abroad. And what are the objections? Why, my friends from Michigan, for whom I have the highest respect, come up here and object on the ground of copper. Why, sir, I have in my hand a list of the various articles used in the construction of ships and the duties on them. On a ship of seven hundred and fifty tons there were duties amounting to $4,500, and of that the whole amount of tax on "copper bolts, nails, and paint" together is only $175. Our ships have not been coppered in this country for a series of years past. They go abroad to be coppered and will go abroad for that purpose whether this bill is passed or not. This matter of copper, therefore, is the merest trifle, and I do not care whether it is in the bill or not. I am perfectly willing that it shall be stricken out. I hope my distinguished friends from Michigan, who base their attack on copper, will withdraw and let copper be stricken out. It is too small a matter to contest.

Let me say further that the bill does come in conflict with the iron interests of Pennsylvania; but I was in the Senate a few weeks since when a bill similar to this was under discussion there, and the senior Senator from Pennsylvania, who is as largely interested in the welfare of that great State as perhaps any man in it, made an argument in favor of the bill, and said that Pennsylvania could afford to be generous to this interest.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to a point of order. I submit that it is not in order for the gentleman to refer to the proceedings of the other branch of Congress for arguments to influence this House.

Mr. PIKE. I am through with that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. DAWES occupying the chair.) The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PIKE. I can only say to the gentlemen from Pennsylvania on this floor that while they act for themselves, as I know they will, I hope they will manifest no such selfishness as to grasp at so weak a customer as the shipping interest, and hold him with such iron grasp as to squeeze the very life out of him, and all for the purpose of making a small profit out of sales to him that they can well afford to forego. They can afford to let this customer go free, and this whole House can afford to say to American ship-builders and American ship-owners, for the time, depressed as you have been by these adverse circumstances, you may go free from these onerous navigation laws that necessity has heretofore imposed upon you until you get an opportunity to recuperate somewhat; until you can reestablish American shipping abroad; until once more the struggling nationalities of the world and the hundreds of thousands of the oppressed may gather heart and hope from seeing the stars and stripes float again in their harbors, and thus gather from it the knowledge that the great Republic of the West is strengthening itself, and will aid them by its influence and example and by the power of its principles in their struggles hereafter. I cannot believe that this House will deliberately abandon the right arm of our national strength.

Mr. ALLISON obtained the floor.

Mr. BROOMALL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment to suggest an amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. I yield to the gentleman. The SPEAKER pro tempore. No amendment is in order at this time.

Mr. BROOMALL. I propose, with the consent of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] and of the gentleman from Iowa, to offer an amendment to the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. MORRELL.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts withdraw the motion to recommit?

Mr. ELIOT. I will first hear what the amendment is.

Mr. BROOMALL. I desire to amend the amendment of my colleague [Mr. MORRELL] by inserting just before the proviso in the second section, the following:

And for the purpose of raising the moneys required to pay the said bounty, and to compensate the loss by the said drawback, ten per cent. thereof shall be added to the duties now imposed by law upon all goods hereafter imported.

Mr. ELIOT. I cannot withdraw the motion to recommit to allow any such amendment as that to be offered.

Mr. COVODE. I desire to correct an error into which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LYNCH] seems to have fallen. He said there had not been a ton of coal shipped from Pennsylvania and Maryland to any port east of New York. I desire to say that there were thirty thousand tons of coal shipped from my own mines, in my own county, to the East; it was sent to Massachusetts last year, and we expect to ship fifty thousand tons there this year.

Mr. LYNCH. I desire to say that I was speaking of the time when the reciprocity was in operation. I did not intend to say, and if I did it was by mistake, that not a ton of coal was shipped east of New York; but I intended to say that no large amount was shipped there. And I want further to say that I made this same statement at a dinner in Pittsburgh, and it was not only not contradicted, but I was told by the largest owners of coal mines there present, that what I had said was literally true.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, House bill No. 867, for the relief of Jonathan Jessup, postmaster at York, Pennsylvania.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 522) to authorize the Commissioner of Revenue to settle the accounts of Andrew S. Core; and

An act (S. No. 540) to regulate the sale of hay in the District of Columbia.

The message further announced that the Senate requested the return of House bill No. 650, to amend the act of the 3d of March, 1865, providing for the construction of certain wagon-roads in Dakota Territory.

WAGON-ROADS IN DAKOTA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the request of the Senate, just received, will be granted, for the return to the Senate of House bill No. 650, to amend the act of the 3d of March, 1865, providing for the construction of certain wagon-roads in Dakota Territory.

No objection was made; and the bill was accordingly directed to be returned to the Senate.

PROMOTION OF AMERICAN COMMERCE.

The House then resumed the consideration of House bill No. 929, to promote American commerce.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to occupy a few moments by calling attention to the second section of this bill. I have not examined the other sections particularly, and therefore shall not now refer to them.

I object to the second section of this bill, first, because it does not come from the proper committee of this House. The proposition involved in that section is one to take money out of the Treasury of the United States placed there by means of import duties, and therefore should be considered in connection with any tariff bill which may be brought forward. My friend, the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, [Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois,] smiles at that remark. I know this question was referred to that committee, but I hold that I am correct nevertheless, as the subject should be considered by the Committee of Ways and Means.

In considering this section we must from necessity consider what amount of money will be taken out of the Treasury of the United States in order that that money may be given to the ship-builders of Maine and other States. They tell us that it costs $10,000 to the ship-builders on each ship they build, because of the onerous tariff duties we have imposed. I believe that is true. I agree with my friends who advocate this measure that this ship-building interest has been depressed because of excessive duties, as I also believe other interests have been depressed by excessive duties upon other articles. The true remedy lies in a revision of our tariff laws so that no great interest shall be depressed in order to foster and protect particular interests.

But who is to be protected by means of this bill? If you will turn to this second section you will see that everything that enters into the building of a ship is to be allowed to be imported free of duty; in other words, a drawback is to be given to the man who imports any article to be used in the construction of any vessel. It is simply a proposition to enable the ship-carpenters of Maine to use the lumber of New Brunswick and Canada, the iron and copper of England and Sweden, and the cordage of Russia, in building their ships. It proposes to strike down absolutely three or four or five of the great interests of this country, in a certain degree at least, by a vicious system of drawbacks, under which great frauds may be perpetrated on the revenue.

Now, I want my friend from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] to tell us why they ask for free trade in ship-building, and insist upon protection for every other branch of manufacturing industry?

Mr. BLAINE. I can answer the gentleman.

Mr. ALLISON. In a moment. If free trade is good for Maine and for ships and ship-building, why is it not good for the whole country? If it is good for one great interest, why is it not good for all great interests? I want that question answered.

Mr. BLAINE. I will answer the gentleman in a word, that the shipping interest is differently situated. When you build a ship for the commerce of the world you send it abroad to compete with every other ship in every other country. You are unable by your laws to give her any protection or to prevent the greatest competition from every other nation in the world. When you protect your manufactures at home by laying a duty upon the same manufacture of other countries, why, sir, you shut out the entire competition of the world. If you levy an internal revenue tax upon our manufactures here, you at the same time raise the tariff duty in order that the internal tax may not depress the home manufacture or give an advantage to the foreign article. You raise the tariff in order that you may shut out foreign competition. If the gentleman from Iowa cannot see the difference between a vessel launched and that departs for foreign ports, not deriving any benefit from our laws, and which has to compete with all the other nations of the world, if he cannot see the difference between that and the manufactures which are protected by a high class of duties, he must then conclude that his logic is false.

I say further, Mr. Speaker, that I object entirely to this being considered a bounty to the ship-builder. I object utterly to it. I deny it. I deny that it is a bounty. I say that all the ship-builders ask is to be relieved from these burdens. There is a wide distinction in the logic and statement of the case. You find no protection to these ships. If I build a ship on the banks of the Kennebec, send her to Liverpool, and she meets a ship from the banks of the St. John, or from any other part of the world, now what protection do your laws give her over the foreign ship? What protection do you give her? Not the slightest in the world.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I should like to ask the gentleman from Maine a question, if he will allow me, right in the line of what he is saying. There are three or four million men in the West who ask only to be relieved from the burdens of taxation. The gentleman says that is all the ship-building interest ask. I say there are three or four million laborers in the West—

Mr. BLAINE. When that question comes up we will then discuss it.

One fact further; I have not listened to the debate, but I suppose it has been exhausted. There is one fact which gentlemen ignore entirely, and that is the freights of these ships are in many instances more valuable than the cargoes they carry, the immense trade carried in American bottoms from the Chincha Islands, the guano trade, there the freights were uniformly worth more than the cargo itself. To-day the vast amount of freights for the transportation of British coal amount to more than the cargo. It is on freights that Great Britain is growing rich and drawing to herself the riches of the world. Yet we stand here haggling over the remission of a little bit of duty which is insignificant compared with the millions of freights we might have in our grasp if we gave any fair encouragement to our commerce.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Speaker, I was asking, when interrupted by the gentleman from Maine, how he and others on this floor, who have imposed on us heavy burdens in the shape of a tariff, can reconcile their votes with a proposition to absolutely free one entire class of industry from all internal and external taxation except that paid as consumers of products? Every interest in this country must expect to be burdened, at least for some time to come. We must have a heavy duty upon articles imported from abroad. We must have a large revenue. We must also have internal taxation. Every interest in the country is compelled to pay revenue in one shape or the other to the Government. Here is a proposition that one great interest shall be exempted from internal taxation, and that they shall have all their materials imported free. The gentleman from Maine speaks of the freights being more valuable in many instances than the cargo. That is not confined to trade upon the ocean. A bushel of corn in Iowa, on the farm where it is produced, is not worth half as much as it is in Boston and New York; and this difference in price is paid to those who transport it, and yet by your navigation laws which protect the American ship-owner the western farmer is compelled to transport this hard-earned product in an American vessel from New Orleans to New York or Boston, although a foreign vessel may be ready at New Orleans to transport his product for one fourth the price charged by the American vessel. Not content, however, with the advantage secured by our navigation laws, we are asked to allow this drawback upon all that enters into the building of a vessel, instead of adjusting import duties so that this interest, as well as all others, may prosper alike.

While I would gladly see the ship-carpenters prosper in this country, I cannot consent that prosperity shall come to them by means of any special legislation here. I would prefer that they should build houses, if they cannot build ships profitably without coming here and asking us to put into their pockets four or five million dollars annually in the shape of drawbacks which must be replaced with duties paid by the consumers of the whole country.

Mr. BLAINE. The effect would be to put more cargoes in English vessels.

Mr. ALLISON. My friend knows very well that the shipping interest of Great Britain, as well as of the United States, has been depressed for the last two or three years. The registry of the tonnage of England for 1867 was less than that of 1866.

Mr. PIKE. How much?

Mr. ALLISON. Two or three hundred thousand tons, I believe.

Mr. PIKE. Oh, no.

Mr. ALLISON. And the tonnage of 1866 was less than that of 1865, so that this depression of the ship-building interest is not confined to the United States alone, but has extended over other nations. And why? Because the channels of commerce are changing, as are the modes of transporting products. For almost a century we have had navigation laws which gave special privileges to our own people engaged in the coastwise trade. And the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] cites that as a reason why the Pacific Mail Steamship Company is prosperous, and has been able to extend its business so as to establish a line between California and China. Now, the coastwise trade, protected by our navigation laws, is a bounty to American ship-owners and ship-builders; and to-day, if you wish to ship a cargo from New York to San Francisco, you are compelled to pay tribute, under the construction of your navigation laws, to an American steamship company. No foreign vessel can carry a cargo from New York to San Francisco or the reverse. Now that great trade is confined to American vessels, and, notwithstanding this favorable legislation, has decreased for a few years past because of the building of three or four lines of railway between New York and New Orleans, which have taken much of the carrying trade hitherto performed by vessels alone, and because of the rebellion, which, for a time, nearly destroyed it.

Of over two thousand steam vessels registered in Great Britain in 1867 only fifty-three are wooden vessels. Iron vessels are rapidly taking the place of wooden ones; so that it was not only because of these high duties that the general shipping interest is depressed, but because of all these changes in the construction of vessels and modes of transportation; and I will add, because, also, we are in an unfortunate condition, coming out of a gigantic war, resulting in the depreciation of our currency, which create high prices and, consequently, high wages. Now are we, because of this temporary, abnormal condition of things, to go into special legislation for the benefit of a particular interest, confined at most to a few localities, and which must be temporary in its character.

Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of discussing at length the provisions of this bill. I only want to warn gentlemen on both sides of the House that they are establishing a principle here which exceeds anything that has hitherto prevailed in our legislation, a principle which will take money out of the Treasury of the United States for the benefit of a class. Since this debate began it has been stated that on the Kennebec river there are to-day fifteen or twenty vessels being built. Now, this bill proposes to give to these ship-builders a bounty of from five to ten thousand dollars on these very ships in the shape of drawbacks on the materials they use. Sir, I, for one, in the present depressed condition of our finances, while the people are straining the last nerve to put money into the Treasury, am opposed to this special temporary legislation. I think we may as well test the question now on this bill. I have promised, however, to yield to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. Pile,] after which I shall move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to make an inquiry in regard to the effect of this bill. I understand the gentleman to say that already by virtue of our laws a large protection is given to all American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade. Is there any provision in this bill which proposes to allow these drawbacks by which any discrimination is made between those vessels engaged in the coasting trade and those engaged in the carrying trade to foreign ports?

Mr. ALLISON. None whatever, as I understand.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It seems to me that there would be manifest justice in making a discrimination.

Mr. PIKE. Let me say that we have no statistics giving the amount of tonnage confined to the coasting trade. During the summer time vessels engage in the coasting trade, and in winter the very same vessels go to the West Indies and engage in the foreign trade. Formerly they did that, and they had the West India trade, but to-day they are driven out of that trade by British vessels, and the sugars of Havana and the dye-stuffs and sugars of Hayti and the West Indies generally are brought into New York in foreign vessels, and the very class of vessels the gentleman speaks of come in competition with English vessels as much as any other.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will allow me to make a single remark in reply to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It must be manifest to the House that these vessels for which the gentleman asks protection by this legislation have now a very large protection whenever they are engaged in the summer in the coasting trade, and that they have a monopoly of that very business. And yet the gentleman asks that they shall be further protected.

Mr. PIKE. The great majority are not in the coasting trade at all; they are altogether in the foreign trade.

Mr. ALLISON. I yield for a few moments to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. Pile.]

Mr. PILE. Mr. Speaker, the city that I have the honor in great part to represent is largely interested in copper and very largely interested in iron. The State in which that city is situated has more iron than any other State in the Union and, perhaps, more than any other three States. And yet, sir, coming as I do from that State and from that city thus interested in copper and iron, on which drawbacks are to be allowed by this bill, I favor the bill, and hope that it will pass, because it is one step, and one step only, in the right direction.

So far, sir, in the progress of this discussion the measure has been treated mainly as if it applied to the ship-building interest of the State of Maine, and to that interest alone. If that were true, I should oppose the bill, but I do not so understand it. The measure is intended, and will so far as it goes in the right direction, tend to relieve the burdened commerce of the United States, and in doing that will incidentally promote the peculiar interests of the extreme Northeast. What we must do, if we are not ready to make up our minds to allow England to do the carrying trade of this country, is to adopt such legislation as will bring back to American commerce and American bottoms the trade that we have lost in the last eight years. And I want to say that this bill is defective; and my objection to it is that it does not go far enough, and that its effect will only be partial. The price of labor is so high in this country, and will be so high for the next twenty-five or fifty years, that with all taxes removed from the ship-building interest, and from the materials used in ship building, and all tariffs removed from articles that enter into the construction of vessels, American ship-yards cannot, in my judgment, and will not be able in the next twenty-five years, to compete with England and France, and especially with England, with her pauper labor, her cheap labor, in the construction of ships, and especially of that class of vessels that do the ocean carrying trade. If we would relieve American commerce from the causes that are crucifying and destroying it we must allow American capitalists to go and buy their vessels where they can buy them cheapest.

I want to say, now, that it is my deliberate opinion, from three or four months' careful consideration of this subject, and from the statistics which I have examined, but which I have not time to refer to now, that our trade will continue to be carried as it now is—to be carried in the proportion of $600,000,000 in foreign bottoms to $200,000,000 in American bottoms, or in a still greater proportion in the future, unless we allow capital to buy cheaply manufactured vessels where it can.

And if it be true—and I think it is capable of demonstration that it is true—that our only means of participating in the commerce of the seas, in carrying our own products to foreign shores, and bringing back to this country the products of other lands, is by relieving our commerce from these restrictions, then I think it should be relieved. If we are not willing that the whole of this carrying trade shall continue to be done in foreign bottoms, if we want to bring this trade back to the owners of American vessels and to American shippers, then we must relieve it from these restrictions and allow capital to buy these vessels. It is only a question whether foreign shippers shall do this carrying trade for us, or whether we shall allow our people to buy vessels and compete with them.

And with a view of perfecting this bill, and carrying it still further in the right direction, I have prepared an amendment, which I earnestly hope the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT,] who has charge of this bill, will allow to be offered. I send to the Clerk and ask to have read an additional section, which I desire to offer to this bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to allow the registry and enrollment of five iron steamships of foreign construction, to be used in the transportation of western produce between the mouth of the Mississippi river and the sea-board cities: Provided, Said ships shall be owned exclusively by American citizens.

Mr. PILE. I hope the gentleman will allow this amendment to be offered.

Mr. ELIOT. It is not germane to the bill; and I would not allow it to be offered if it were.

Mr. ALLISON. I now yield three minutes of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER. I do not desire to say much in regard to this bill. I will first say to my friends from Michigan, who are so much troubled about the copper-mining interest in that State, that the people of Massachusetts have planted about six million dollars in copper mines around Lake Superior, the stock of which is not, as a general thing, worth the paper it is printed upon; and they are as much interested in the high tariff on copper as others are, still they do not oppose that interest to the ship-building interest.

I will state a single fact to the House which I think deserves some consideration. In 1862 we had two hundred and sixty-eight thousand tons of shipping engaged in the fishing business. We have gone on losing and losing our interest in that business until now we have but a little over ninety thousand tons engaged in the fishing business. It has not been by any means because of the reduction of the bounty on codfish. Nor has it been, as has been suggested to me, because petroleum has put down the price of whale-oil. Kerosene has reduced the price of lard-oil to a certain degree, but the price of whale-oil is as high as it ever was, to a great extent. It is simply because of wrong legislation in reference to our commercial interests.

This matter is not of local interest merely. Every day we are paying to foreign vessels the freights for the articles of commerce carried to and from this country, and will continue to do so until we properly foster our shipping interest. The corn of the State of Illinois is not worth so much by from two to five cents per bushel as it would be if we had American shipping, as can be easily demonstrated by statistics. This bill is therefore a western bill as well as an eastern bill. It takes nothing out of the Treasury now, because there are substantially no ships building now; there is no cordage, no iron, and no copper now being imported for the purpose of ship-building.

It is said that there are fifteen ships building on the Kennebec. Why, sir, if the ship-building business of this country was in a proper condition those fifteen ships would be multiplied by ten. Yet, what is the fact? You can go to St. Johns, New Brunswick, and buy for fifty dollars a ton a ship which will register A No. 1 at the insurance offices; while on the Kennebec a ship cannot be built under our laws for less than ninety dollars a ton. It is true our ship would be better, but it would register no better; it would not bring a higher price; the only advantage would be that it would last a little longer.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ALLISON. The contest between our friends from Maine and Pennsylvania, as evidenced by the amendments proposed, only shows that the effect of this bill, if passed, will be to take money out of the Treasury of the United States; and, Mr. Speaker, as a means of testing the sense of the House on this question I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. ELIOT. I raise the point of order that that motion cannot be made pending the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. PIKE. If the bill is not laid upon the table I will move to strike out the provision in regard to copper.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. HARDING demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 82, nays 45, not voting 62; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Beaman, Beatty, Beck, Benjamin, Bingham, Blair, Broomall, Buckland, Cake, Cary, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Delano, Driggs, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Getz, Golladay, Griswold, Grover, Halsey, Harding, Hawkins, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Chester D. Mr. ALLISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF GENERAL RUSLING.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of Brevet Brigadier General James F. Rusling, inspector of the quartermaster general's department, for the year ending June 30, 1867; which, on motion of Mr. DAWES, was referred to the Committee of Elections.

TWENTY PER CENT. TO CLERKS AND OTHERS.

Mr. BINGHAM. I give notice that after the reading of the Journal to-morrow, I will call up my motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was adopted giving twenty per cent. additional pay to the Department clerks and others.

The SPEAKER stated that the House resumed the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Commerce, by Mr. O'NEILL, on which he was entitled to the floor.

Then, on motion of Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, (at five o'clock and five minutes p.m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By the SPEAKER: The petition of citizens of Fayette county, Texas, for a division of said State.

By Mr. DAWES: A memorial of Thomas Allen, praying for payment of balance due for printing statistics for the State Department in 1841 under a special provision of law.

By Mr. BANKS: A memorial of the administrators of Elias Howe, jr., in aid of his petition praying an extension of his patent.

By Mr. KETCHAM: The petition of F. W. Sanborn, acting ensign United States Navy, for relief.

Also, the petition of F. W. Sanborn, late commanding officer United States steamer Columbine, asking for the payment of prize money to officers and crew of said steamer.

By Mr. MARVIN: The petition of the president and directors of the New York Northern Railroad Company, asking aid of the General Government for the construction of a railroad from Schenectady to Ogdensburg, thereby saving one hundred miles between tide-water and the St. Lawrence river, opening to market the inexhaustible beds of iron ore in northern New York, and perfecting the military defenses on our northern frontier.

By Mr. MULLINS: The petition of Joseph Ramsey and William T. Tune, collector and assessor of internal revenue for the fourth district of Tennessee, praying a modification of the internal revenue laws in a reduction of the tax upon distilled spirits, and to tax the capacity of the distillery.

By Mr. WILLIAMS: The petitions of 4 manufacturing firms of Alleghany and Armstrong counties, Pennsylvania, employing when in full operation 635 workmen, now employing 385 workmen; signed, also, by employees of said firms, setting forth that owing to the want of sufficient protection against the cheaper capital and labor of foreign countries, the productive interests of this country are suffering and its industry paralyzed; and praying Congress to resume consideration of the tariff bill (as passed by the Senate) which failed in the House March, 1867, and enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

Also, the petition of S. A. Pearce and others, citizens of Butler county, Pennsylvania, complaining of the depression of manufacturing industry, and praying for such increase of protective duties as will revive manufactures and restore prosperity to the country.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 18, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. A. D. GILLETTE, D. D.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 16th instant, information relative to the present status of the claims of loyal Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians under the forty-ninth article of the treaty with those tribes of April 28, 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. SPRAGUE presented the credentials of his election by the Legislature of Rhode Island as a Senator from that State for the term of six years from the 4th of March, 1869; which were read, and ordered to be filed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of John C. Rand, F. B. Dakin, George P. Carter & Co., S. G. Andrews, and four hundred and forty other firms and individuals engaged in printing and book-binding in Boston, Massachusetts, complaining of the insufficiency of the customs duties to protect domestic industry against the cheaper labor and capital of foreign countries, and praying for the consideration and passage of the general tariff bill which failed for want of time in the Thirty-Ninth Congress; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SPRAGUE presented the petition of William Roach, representing that he is the father of Ellen Roach, who was killed by the explosion at the arsenal in Washington city, in June, 1864, and that he has not received any part of the money appropriated for the relief of the sufferers, praying such an appropriation for his relief as may seem just and equitable; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMERICAN SHARP-SHOOTERS' ASSOCIATION.

Mr. MORGAN. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 295) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to remit the duties on certain articles contributed to the National Association of American Sharp-shooters, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report in favor of its passage. The proposition is to remit the duties on prizes contributed to this association to the extent of $1,000 in currency. I ask that the resolution may be considered at this time; it is rather important, as the association hold their festival next week.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to remit the duties on all prizes contributed to the National Association of American Sharp-shooters for the third American shooting festival, by friends and kindred associations in Europe, which may be imported into the United States prior to the 6th day of July, 1868; but the value of the prizes so contributed and imported is not to exceed the aggregate sum of $1,000 in currency.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JONATHAN S. TURNER.

Mr. FERRY. The Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom was referred the petition of Jonathan S. Turner, for an extension of his patent, report in favor of it, and recommend the passage of a joint resolution (S. R. No. 147) for his relief, which I introduced the other day. The resolution will, I think, lead to no debate, and as it is important for the interests of this party that it should be passed at once I ask that it may be considered now.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 147) for the relief of Jonathan S. Turner was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The preamble recites that Jonathan S. Turner, of Fair Haven, in the county of New Haven, and State of Connecticut, obtained letters-patent of the United States for an improvement in alarm-clocks, dated July 13, 1852; that he did, on or about the 27th day of December, 1865, file in the Patent Office his petition or application for an extension of the term, in accordance with the provisions of the eighteenth section of the patent act, approved July 4, 1836, and complied with all the requirements of the rules and laws applicable thereto, except the inadvertent omission of one revenue stamp of the value of five cents, for which omission only the Acting Commissioner of Patents did, on the 12th day of July, 1866, refuse to extend the patent. The resolution proposes, therefore, to direct the Commissioner of Patents to extend the term of the patent for seven years from and after the 13th day of July, 1866. The patent, so extended, is to have the same validity, force, and effect as though the extension had been allowed and certified by the Commissioner of Patents, in accordance with the eighteenth section of the patent act, approved July 4, 1836, before the expiration of the original term.

Mr. FERRY. The facts in the case are stated in the preamble. Mr. Turner made his application for a renewal of his patent after the expiration of its original term in the ordinary mode; it was referred to the proper examiner, and by him recommended to be granted; but the papers upon being examined by the Acting Commissioner of Patents were found in a single instance to be destitute of a revenue stamp of the value of five cents, and the Acting Commissioner of Patents did not feel authorized to act upon the paper in which that omission was made, and declined to extend the patent. As soon as the fact was made known to Mr. Turner he made this application, and the Commissioner of Patents, in a communication to the committee, earnestly recommends that the prayer of the petitioner be granted.

Mr. POMEROY. I wish to ask the Senator whether in dating this back the patentee would have a remedy against those who have manufactured the article in the interval?

Mr. FERRY. There has been no manufacture during the interval. It is a patent of not much value, and very little use. I am not aware that there has been any interest created during the interval.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not wish to give the right to this patentee to prosecute persons who have been manufacturing in this interval by the fact that we now date it back and make it good for two years.

Mr. FERRY. I believe there are no adverse parties.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not know anything about it myself.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to ask the Senate to devote to-day to the business of the Committee on Commerce. The Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] gave us notice that he should call up a bill from the Committee on Appropriations; but he is unwilling to-day, and will not be able to occupy the day as he expected to do. I therefore ask the Senate to grant this day from one o'clock to the Committee on Commerce. I move that the business from that committee be made the special order for one o'clock.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope there will be no special orders made for to-day. There are various bills on the Calendar that will require but little or no time, perhaps, that should be considered.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have twenty-one bills in my drawer reported from the Committee on Commerce. Last Saturday a week ago was set apart for the consideration of the business of that committee, but it was pushed aside by our reconstruction bill. I must have a day for this business. Of course, I do not wish to antagonize with other bills. I have not antagonized the bills of the Committee on Commerce, although there are a great number of them, with other measures, for the reason that they would require a whole day. I therefore ask for to-day for the consideration of bills from that committee.

Mr. POMEROY. There are other committees that have charge of bills of great importance as well as the Committee on Commerce. I always go with the Senator from Michigan; but there are other committees, the Committee on Public Lands, the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, that have charge of bills of importance.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well; we must assign a day to each committee. It will not do to antagonize bill by bill. If I can only present one bill and leave twenty it will simply lead to constant antagonism. If the Senate will not give me to-day, I shall ask for to-morrow, or the earliest day that they will grant; but a day I must have. I hope to get through in a day, but may not. I shall do the very best I can.

Mr. MORGAN. Do I understand the Senator from Michigan to say that the legislative appropriation bill is not to be considered to-day?

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator having it in charge is sick, and, as I am informed, will not be here, and therefore I think this is the best day I can have.

Mr. MORGAN. If that be so I think it is entirely proper that the Committee on Commerce should have to-day in lieu of the day that was taken from them.

Mr. CHANDLER. Last Saturday a week ago was granted to the Committee on Commerce, but it was taken from us by the reconstruction bill, and therefore I now ask for to-day for the business of that committee.

Mr. POMEROY. There can be no objection to bills of public importance being considered, whether they come from the Committee on Commerce or any other committee; but that all the bills of the Committee on Commerce shall be considered in one day is a monstrous proposition. Public bills of great importance should be considered without regard to the committees from which they come.

Mr. CHANDLER. We have given Saturday to the Committee on Pensions, and it is the custom to grant days in this way to various committees.

Mr. POMEROY. I am perfectly willing that public bills of great importance reported from the Committee on Commerce shall be considered; but I am not willing to agree that we shall go on and take up the whole list of bills reported by them simply because they come from that committee.

Mr. CHANDLER. If I should get up every morning and antagonize a single bill from the Committee on Commerce with other measures we should spend our whole time in discussing the order of business, whereas if the Senate will give me one day I can accomplish what would take twenty days by antagonizing other bills as they came up.

Mr. POMEROY. There is not a Senator on this floor but can say that. That is true of all bills and of the business of every committee.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is the custom, and has been ever since I have been a member of the body, to grant a day in this way to particular committees. The Committee on the District of Columbia has a day; the Committee on Pensions has a day. The Committee on Commerce now asks for a day. It has been the custom of the Senate ever since I have been in the body, which has been nearly twelve years, to grant such a request; and I hope it will be continued.

Mr. POMEROY. In order to break up that custom the Senate adopted a rule requiring a two-thirds vote in order to make a special assignment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no question before the Senate, unless by common consent, until the morning business is through with. Reports of committees are regularly in order; but the Senator from Michigan proposes to make a motion which can only be received at this time by unanimous consent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let that be postponed until one o'clock, and then we can settle it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia to report back the report of the Secretary, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of January 20, 1868, information relative to the purchase and sale of vessels by the War Department during the war of the rebellion. The document is a very voluminous one, and the committee thought it was not best to order it to be printed, but to return it to the Secretary's office, where it may be ordered to be printed at any time. I move that the committee be discharged from its consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 529) establishing rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States, reported it with amendments.

Mr. HENDRICKS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the memorial of the Governor of Minnesota in relation to the university lands in that State, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 555) authorizing the allowance of the claim of the State of Minnesota to lands for the support of a State university. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 939) to provide for an American line of mail and emigrant passenger steamships between New York and one or more European ports, reported it without amendment.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the resolution (H. R. No. 215) relative to the Louisville Bridge Company, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 542) for the relief of Thomas W. Ward, collector of customs at Corpus Christi, Texas, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CATTELL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 543) to provide for a further issue of temporary loan certificates for the purpose of redeeming and retiring the remainder of the outstanding compound-interest notes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. WILLEY. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 138) to appoint a board of examiners for claimants against the United States in the State of Nevada, have directed me to report it back and move its indefinite postponement.

Mr. STEWART. I hope that resolution will not be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be passed over, if objection be made to its consideration.

Mr. WILLEY. I will change my motion, then, and simply move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of John Lockwood, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of J. G. Bigelow and the petition of Julius W. Knowlton, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

ROBERT L. LINDSAY.

Mr. DAVIS. The Committee on Claims have had under consideration a joint resolution (H. R. No. 268) for the relief of Robert L. Lindsay. I am directed to report the resolution back to the Senate without amendment, and to recommend its passage.

Mr. DRAKE. I would ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to allow that joint resolution to be put on its passage now. I will state to the Senate that there are circumstances in the condition of this gentleman of very great urgency; and as the House has passed the resolution, and the Senate Committee on Claims has reported in favor of it, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider it now.

By unanimous consent the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Paymaster General of the Army to pay to Robert L. Lindsay, late of the fiftieth regiment Missouri volunteers, the full pay and allowances of a second lieutenant of infantry from the 2d day of August, 1864, to the 30th day of November, 1864.

Mr. WILSON. I desire some explanation of this resolution.

Mr. DRAKE. The honorable Senator from Kentucky is quite familiar with the facts, and I presume can give the explanation better than I can.

Mr. DAVIS. I can explain it in a very few words. Mr. Lindsay was commissioned by the Governor of Missouri a second lieutenant in 1864. His commission bears date in July of that year. He proceeded very actively and successfully to raise a company, beginning some time in August. So soon as he raised his company he joined the service, and was in the battle of Pilot Knob, where he, with other officers, received the special notice and approbation of General Rosecrans for gallant services. He had not an opportunity, in consequence of his being cut off by Price's army from the place where the regiment was, to muster in his company until after the battle, and until after he had raised his company and rendered this active and distinguished service for three or four months' interval of time, in which he asks to be allowed the pay of a second lieutenant. He simply asks to be allowed that pay for the time he was actually in the service of the United States and doing gallant service, for which time he was unable to have his company mustered in by reason of the facts I have stated.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. POMEROY. I am charged with several bills that have been for some time in my drawer, put into my hands by men from States that are not represented, the States of Alabama and Georgia. I have delayed introducing them because I thought it was due that those States should be represented here; and as there is now a hope that they will soon be represented I have thought I would introduce the bills so that they may be printed and lie over. Of course I do not expect any action on them until these States are represented. They relate to expired railroad grants and some local legislation that we cannot be as familiar with as the representation from the States concerned. I merely want to introduce the bills for the purpose of reference and have them printed with the distinct understanding that no action will be taken upon them until these States are represented. I ask unanimous consent to introduce these bills now, notice not having been given.

No objection being made, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 556) to revive the grant of lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from Selma to Gadsden, in the State of Alabama, and to extend the time for the completion of said road, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

By unanimous consent, leave was also granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 557) for completing a direct and continuous line of railroad from Washington city to Mobile and other points South, creating a post route from Washington city to Mobile and New Orleans, thereby securing a more certain, speedy, and economical transportation of the United States mails, military stores, and munitions of war; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 558) to extend the limits of certain land grants in Iowa and Minnesota; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 150) relative to the payment of certain claims to loyal citizens of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILLEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 559) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to rent rooms necessary for the speedy and convenient transaction of the business of the Patent Office; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

APPEALS AND WRITS OF ERROR.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to take up Senate bill No. 472, which has been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 472) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to allow the United States to prosecute appeals and writs of error without giving security" was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to extend the provisions of the act entitled "An act to allow the United States to prosecute appeals and writs of error without giving security," approved February 21, 1863, to writs of error, appeals, or other process in law, admiralty, or equity, issuing from, or brought up to, a circuit court of the United States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The only provision of this bill is to allow the United States to prosecute appeals from the district to the circuit courts without giving security for costs. It becomes necessary in revenue cases. It is very desirable oftentimes to have those cases taken from the district court by appeal or writ of error to the circuit court. As the law now stands security is required on the part of the United States. Of course it is difficult to obtain it, and improper that it should be required.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE CHIEF JUSTICESHIP.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I now move to take up House bill No. 861, relating to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 861) relating to the Supreme Court of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary reported an amendment, to strike out all of the House bill after the enacting clause and insert a substitute. The amendment only need be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The original bill will not be read unless some Senator calls for its reading. The words proposed to be inserted in lieu of it by the amendment of the committee will be read.

The words proposed to be inserted were read, as follows:

That in case of a vacancy in the office of Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, or of his inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve upon the associate justice of said court whose commission is senior in time until such inability shall be removed or another appointment shall be duly made, and the person so appointed shall be duly qualified, and this act shall apply to every person succeeding to the office of Chief Justice pursuant to its provisions.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PORT OF DELIVERY AT CAMBRIDGE.

Mr. CHANDLER. I propose now, with the indulgence of the Senate, to go on with the bills of the Committee on Commerce. I move first to take up Senate bill No. 533.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 533) to establish Cambridge, in the State of Maryland, a port of delivery, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. By the bill Cambridge, within the collection district of Baltimore, is to be a port of delivery within that district; and a deputy collector is to be appointed to reside at the port of Cambridge, whose compensation is to be the usual fees of office and nothing more.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MICHIGAN COLLECTION DISTRICTS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 198.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 198) to reestablish the boundaries of the collection districts of Michigan and Michilimackinac and to change the names of the collection districts of Michilimackinac and Port Huron was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first section proposes to extend the collection district of Michigan so as to embrace all the territory and waters of the State of Michigan lying west of the principal meridian and south of the latitudinal line dividing townships number forty-three from townships number forty-four, north of the base line of that State, excluding the territory bordering Green bay and including the island of Bois Blanc.

The second section provides that the collection district of Michilimackinac shall hereafter be called the district of Superior, and shall embrace all that part of the upper peninsula of the State of Michigan lying east of the principal meridian, all the islands in and bordering upon the St. Marie river, and all that part of the State of Michigan lying west of the principal meridian and north of the latitudinal line dividing townships number forty-three from townships number forty-four, north of the base line of the State, including the territory bordering Green bay, together with all the islands, waters, and shores of Lake Superior and the adjacent territory unto the head-waters of all the rivers and streams tributary thereto and within the jurisdiction of the United States.

The third section provides that the collection district of Port Huron, in the State of Michigan, shall hereafter be called the district of Huron.

Mr. HOWE. I have just had my attention called to this bill, and I wish to inquire of the Senator from Michigan if it proposes to annex the ports on the waters of Green bay to the Mackinaw district?

Mr. CHANDLER. No, sir; it does not. On the contrary, it enlarges the Green Bay district; gives a portion of the Mackinaw district to the Green Bay district. The districts are now so arranged that portions of the Mackinaw district are very inconvenient of access to Mackinaw. We propose now to divide them by the meridian line, and to add to the Green Bay district that portion lying adjacent to Green bay, and to give the whole of Lake Superior to the Mackinaw district.

Mr. HOWE. But I understood the Clerk to read "including the waters of Green bay" or "the territories bordering on Green bay," in describing the Mackinaw district.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the bill be laid aside informally until the Senator from Wisconsin can examine the map.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be passed over informally if there be no objection.

Mr. CHANDLER subsequently moved to resume the consideration of the bill; which was again considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOWE. This is unquestionably meant to be right; but I think if the Senator from Michigan will listen to me for a moment he will see that an amendment of two or three words will prevent any misunderstanding about it. The district of Mackinaw is declared to include all the territory of Michigan west of the meridian line, and north of the line between townships forty-three and forty-four, "including the territory bordering Green bay." I propose to insert after the word "territory," in the tenth line of section two, the words "in said State."

Mr. CHANDLER. I will agree to that. The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

COLLECTION DISTRICT OF PHILADELPHIA.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 538.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 538) to extend the boundaries of the collection district of Philadelphia, so as to include the whole consolidated city of Philadelphia.

The Committee on Commerce reported the bill with an amendment, to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause, in the following words:

That the collection district of Philadelphia be so extended as to include within its boundaries the whole consolidated city of Philadelphia.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

That the port of entry and delivery of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, is hereby extended so as to include within its boundaries the whole consolidated city of Philadelphia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. CONKLING. I venture to ask one question about this bill. What is the occasion for it? Why are not the boundaries heretofore established satisfactory, and why is it necessary to change them now?

Mr. CHANDLER. I will state to the Senator that the collection of foreign duties has not included the whole city of Philadelphia. Since the district was first established the city has been enlarged, and there are large depots of oil up and down the river; and it is for the convenience of the commerce of the city to include the additions to the city of Philadelphia in one district. That is the reason.

The amendment was concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

BILL RECOMMENDED.

Mr. COLE. With the permission of the Senator from Michigan, I desire to move the recommitment of a bill to his committee which needs further amendment and revision. I move, therefore, that the bill (S. No. 247) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes," be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

D. H. MACDONALD.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 361.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 361) for the relief of D. H. MacDonald, late acting United States consul at Cape Town, Cape of Good Hope, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to D. H. MacDonald, late acting United States consul at Cape Town, Cape of Good Hope, the sum of $587 67, in full pay for his services as acting consul.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think that bill ought to have gone to the Committee on Claims. I should like to know if there is any report accompanying it. It is a small bill, to be sure.

Mr. CHANDLER. There is a report from the Secretary of State, with a recommendation that the claim shall be paid, on file with the papers.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think it ought to go to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CHANDLER. It was referred to the Committee on Commerce. This gentleman was sent out to Cape Town to take the place of a man who was neglecting and abusing the duties of his office. This man took charge of the office and performed its duties, and took charge of the archives and retained them during this short period, for which we have recommended that he be paid; but the other man contested his right, and until the action of the Department the one that we now propose to pay performed the duties of the office, and the committee were unanimously of the opinion that he should receive the salary. It is but a small amount. The Clerk can read the recommendation from the Secretary of State to that effect, if the Senator desires it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana move the reference of the bill to the Committee on Claims?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think it ought to go to that committee; but it is so inconsiderable a sum that I will not make that motion if the report of the Secretary of State sustains the claim. The chairman of the committee asks that the communication from the State Department be read, and if that is satisfactory I am willing to accept it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, February 3, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 18th ultimo, inclosing a petition of D. H. MacDonald, esq., for compensation as acting consul at Cape Town, from the 17th of January, 1863, to the 9th of June of the same year, and requesting such information as may be in this Department relating to said claim.

In answer thereto, I have to inform you that considerable correspondence has taken place between this Department and Mr. MacDonald with reference to his claim, all of which it is not thought worth while to communicate, but which is at your disposal should your committee desire it.

On the 28th July, 1866, Mr. MacDonald addressed a letter to this Department with regard to his claim. On the receipt of that letter the matter was investigated, and the result of that investigation was an opinion that Mr. MacDonald's claim should be paid, but that an application must be made to Congress for relief. Herewith inclosed is a copy of the letter of this Department to Mr. MacDonald, dated September 27, 1866, in answer to his communication.

As further evidence in the case, I herewith send you a copy of a communication from Hon. Benjamin Pringle, dated at Cape Town, December 30, 1863, in which he expresses the opinion, after investigation, that Mr. MacDonald is equitably entitled to the payment of his claim.

The petition of Mr. MacDonald is herewith returned to you.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
WILLIAM H. SEWARD.
Hon. Z. CHANDLER, Chairman of the United States Senate Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is a very remarkable communication from a Department to establish a claim. I will ask the Senator having the bill in charge whether this person discharged the duties for the months mentioned in that letter?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, sir; he did.

Mr. HENDRICKS. What was the other man doing?

Mr. CHANDLER. He was drunk. [Laughter.]

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EVENING STAR NEWSPAPER COMPANY.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I move to take up Senate bill No. 209. It is a little bill reported in March last, which I should like to have passed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 204.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire has interposed a motion to take up the bill mentioned by him.

Mr. CHANDLER. I submit that that is not in order. This day is devoted to the business of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I ask the gentleman's pardon; I was not aware of it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed—

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I wish the gentleman would give way for a few moments. It will not take more than three minutes to pass this bill. It has been on the table since March last.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have more than twenty bills to pass, and if I give way to the Senator I must give way to others.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I will help the gentleman to pass the whole lot if he will let this pass through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill taken up on motion of the Senator from New Hampshire will be read. It is the only one in order. It could be passed three times over while Senators are talking about it. [Laughter.]

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 209) to incorporate the Evening Star Newspaper Company of Washington. It proposes to create and declare Crosby S. Noyes, Clarence B. Baker, Alexander R. Shepherd, George W. Adams, and Samuel H. Kauffmann, and their associates and successors, a body corporate and politic by the name and style of the Evening Star Newspaper Company of Washington, for the purpose of carrying on the business of printing and publishing at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, with the usual powers and privileges of a corporation. The capital stock of the company is not to be less than $100,000, nor more than $200,000, in shares of $1,000 each.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not know that the Senator will be content with the amendment that I propose, but it is to add to the last section that the stockholders shall be individually responsible for the indebtedness of the company to the extent of the par value of their stock.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the bill under consideration be laid aside for perfection, and that the Senate proceed with the business of the Committee on Commerce. I move the postponement of this bill until to-morrow.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I hope that will not be done. It will not take two minutes to dispose of it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let me go on.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Let us pass this bill through, and then we can take up your bills.

Mr. CHANDLER. I make the motion that it be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the amendment is prepared, I have no objection.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to add to the last section the following:

And that each stockholder in the said company shall be individually liable for the debts of the company to the extent of his stock at its par value.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

SURGEON OF MARINE HOSPITALS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 204.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 204) to provide for the appointment of a supervising surgeon of marine hospitals of the United States. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint a competent surgeon at a salary of $— per year, payable monthly, to be styled supervising surgeon of United States marine hospitals, whose duty it is to be, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to inspect and superintend the administration of the marine hospitals of the United States now in use or that may hereafter be erected.

The Committee on Commerce reported the bill with two amendments. The first amendment was in line three, after the word "that," to strike out the words "the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and directed to appoint" and to insert the words "the President of the United States shall nominate and appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line six, to fill the blank with "$3,000," so as to make the salary of the supervising surgeon $3,000 per year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COLE. It seems to me that the title of that bill ought to be changed, so as to read "A bill to provide for the appointment of supervising surgeons for the marine hospitals of the United States."

Mr. SHERMAN. It only provides for one supervising surgeon.

Mr. COLE. As I understand it, it is intended to provide supervising surgeons for all the marine hospitals.

Mr. CHANDLER. No; one supervising surgeon for all the hospitals.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It provides for the appointment of one surgeon, who shall have general charge of the whole of them.

Mr. COLE. I did not so understand the bill.

The CHIEF CLERK. The title of the bill is: "A bill to provide for the appointment of a supervising surgeon of marine hospitals of the United States."

Mr. CHANDLER. It is only one officer for all of them.

Mr. COLE. Very well.

COLLECTION DISTRICT IN OREGON.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move that the Senate take up Senate bill No. 153.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 153) to establish a collection district in the State of Oregon. It provides that all that part of the State of Oregon lying south of Cape Perpetua, embracing all the waters, islands, bays, harbors, inlets, shores, and rivers therein, shall be a collection district, and shall be called the Umpqua district; and the port of entry for the district is to be at Coos bay, and a collector for the district is to be appointed, whose salary is to be $1,500 per annum, and who is to perform the same duties as the collector for the other collection district in the State.

The Committee on Commerce reported the bill with amendments. The first amendment was in lines five and six, to strike out the words "shall be a collection district and shall be" and to insert "is hereby separated from the collection district of Oregon, and shall be, and hereby is, constituted and created a separate collection district in said State, and the same shall be."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eleven, after the word "appointed" to insert the words "to reside at said port of entry."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines thirteen and fourteen, to strike out the words "the same duties as the collector for the collection district in said State" and to insert the words "all the duties and be subject to all the responsibilities devolving by law upon collectors of customs."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE WRIGHT.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 246.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 246) directing the Secretary of State to present to George Wright, master of the British brig J. and G. Wright, a gold chronometer, in appreciation of his personal services in saving the lives of three American seamen, wrecked at sea on board of the American schooner Lizzie F. Choate, of Massachusetts.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHANGE OF NAMES OF VESSELS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1120.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1120) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to change the names of certain vessels was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of the yacht W. W. Abell, owned by James Lloyd Greene, of Norwich, Connecticut, administrator of the estate of Benjamin D. Greene, late of Norwich, deceased, and John Jeffries, jr., of Boston, Massachusetts, to that of Ethel; and also to change the name of the yacht L'Hirondelle, owned by James Gordon Bennett, jr., of the city of New York, to that of Dauntless, and to grant these vessels registers in these respective names, they being pleasure yachts only, and not engaged in commercial or other business.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EVANSVILLE MARINE HOSPITAL.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 44.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 44) relating to the sale of the marine hospital at Evansville, Indiana, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is an authorization to the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the marine hospital at Evansville, Indiana, to the highest bidder, for not less than $10,100, who will keep the same for hospital purposes.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. That resolution seems to be unusual in fixing the price at which the sale shall be made. I ask the Senator from Michigan on what basis this price is fixed?

Mr. CHANDLER. The joint resolution has passed the House of Representatives upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury. It is desirable that the building should be kept open as a hospital, and certain benevolent individuals have agreed to take it at the price named and keep it open.

Mr. SHERMAN. But the price being fixed, and no provision made for a public sale, it looks like an arrangement. However, as the Senator is satisfied that it is all right, I shall not object.

Mr. CHANDLER. Both the House committee and the Senate committee were satisfied.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

R. P. PARROTT.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 303.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 303) for the relief of R. P. Parrott was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to R. P. Parrott the sum of $12,198 35, in full payment for building an iron light-house at Cape Canaveral, in the State of Florida.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I should like some explanation of the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. In 1860 the Government made a contract with Mr. Parrott to build a light-house at Cape Canaveral, Florida. In February, 1861, Mr. Parrott suspended the
